4.11 MRTP ACT, 1969 & COMPETITION ACT, 2002

The Difference between the MRTP Act 1969 and The Competition Act 2002 is as follows - The MRTP Act was enacted in the Pre Liberalisation era whereas the Competition Act is enacted in the Post Liberalisation era; The Object of the old Act was to prevent the economic concentration in one Common detriment, curbing unfair trade practices, and to check monopolistic activities, on the other hand the object of the new Act is to promote and Sustaining Competition in the market and to ensure the freedom of trade and to protect the interest of the consumer in whole; The MRTP Commission has the advisory role only whereas the later has some effective role including that of initiating suo moto actions and impose punishments to the entities having some adverse effect in the market.

The following are the basic differences between MRTP and Competition Act:

S. No	MRTP ACT, 1969	COMPETITION ACT, 2002
1	It is based on the pre- liberalisation and globalisation era.	It is based on the post- reforms scenario.
2	The objective of the Act is to prevent concentration of economic power to common detriment to control of monopolies, prevention of monopolistic and restrictive trade practices.	The objective of the Act is prevent practices having adverse effect on competition and to promote as well as sustaining the competition to protect consumer interests at market place and ensuring freedom of trade.
3	It lists out 14 offences, which are against the principle of natural justice.	It recognises only 4 offences, which are deemed to be against the principle of natural justice.
4	MRTP Commission has the power to pass only "Cease" and "Desist" orders.	The Competition Act can pass an order to prevent and punish such of those activities, which abuses competition.
5	The MRTP Act did not provide for the formation of fund for its activities.	The Competition Act provides competition fund for promotion of competition advocacy and creation of awareness about competitive issues and training as may be prescribed in its rules.
6	Entity having status of dominant position is itself considered as bad.	Entity having status of dominant position is not considered as bad. Whereas abuse of dominant position affecting consumer interest is considered as immoral.
7	In general registration of agreement was mandatory.	It does not lay down any such requirement for registration of agreements.
8	The definition of 'group' was wider.	The 'group' definition has been simplified.
9	The size of the firm, is the factor for determining dominance etc.	It focusses on the firm's structure not on the size factor.

4.12 COMPETITION ACT, 2002 AND CORPORATE GOVERNANCE

In a competitive environment, firms generally cannot expect to earn excess profits. An industry that generates above-average profits tends to attract new competitors, which bring forth additional supply and drive down profitability. Where natural barriers to entry are high, excess profits may persist and interim regulation may be needed to protect consumers. Over time, however, technological advances and entrepreneurial innovations tend to chip away the natural barriers, unless they are prevented by regulations.

To withstand competition, firms need to rely on operation efficiency. Unless their production and administrative costs are kept below prevailing market prices, which may be determined by efficient competitors at home or abroad, they cannot service their debt and meet shareholders' expectations. Investors need to evaluate the viability and cash flows of projects, rather than relying on preferential treatments or on market power. Under effective competition, preferential treatment can be quickly detected and brought to light by those who suffer the adverse consequences.

Where competition is intense and global in scope, more firms realise that corporate governance makes good business sense. Investors seek out firms that run the business efficiently, treat shareholders equitably and comply with high standards of disclosure, even when they are not mandatory. By applying good governance, a firm can earn a good reputation and efficient access to finance, which in turn enhances their ability to compete. In effect, good governance becomes an instrument of competitive strategies.

5.3 THE PREVENTION OF MONEY LAUNDERING ACT, 2002

Money laundering poses a serious threat not only to the financial sector of country but also pose a serious threat to its integrity and sovereignty of the country. It may be a proxy war of the anti-national elements including alien enemies to sabotage the financial sector of the country if not tackled properly. It is the process by which criminals conceal the origin and ownership of the proceeds of crime, by legitimizing illegally obtained money, by channeling surreptitiously through legitimate business channels and integrating those to financial system in a variety of ways like bank deposits, investments or through transfer from one place or person to another.

To achieve the objective of preventing laundering of money and other associate activities a comprehensive legislation was needed. Accordingly the Prevention Money Laundering Bill 1998 was introduced in the Parliament which was further referred to the Standing Committee on Finance which presented its report on 4th March 1999 to the Lok Sabha. The Central Government broadly accepted the recommendations of the Standing Committee and incorporated them in the said bill along with other desired changes. The Bill was passed by both the Houses of Parliament and received the assent of the President on 17th January 2003 and came to be known as the Prevention of Money Laundering Act 2002(15th of 2003)(PMLA).

The act of money laundering has been criminalized in India through the enactment of the Prevention of Money Laundering Act, 2002. Persons and entities who indulge in or assist in the process or activity connected with the proceeds of scheduled crime as defined under the said Act and in projecting it as untainted property are guilty of the said offence of money laundering under Section 3 of the Act. With money laundering becoming an international/global menace rocking the economic and financial edifice of various countries, India has become a member of Financial Action Task Force(FATF) in 2010.

The Act contains 75 sections spread over 10 chapters and one schedule. The Act was last amended vide the Prevention of Money-laundering (Amendment) Act,2009 and another bill titled "The Prevention of Money Laundering(Amendment) Bill 2011" is lying pending in the Parliament [Note: the Prevention of Money Laundering(Amendment) Bill 2011 was introduced in the Lok Sabha 28th November 2012. The Act is yet to be notified by the Central Government]. The Amendment Act when passed and notified would widen the coverage of the law and makes it more stringent and bring it in line with the similar legislation of other countries. The bill extends the meaning of Money Laundering Act to include activities such as concealment and possession of proceeds of crime. The Amendment Bill(2011) also put onus on the banks, Financial Institutions, Intermediaries or person carrying on a specified business to report such instances by introducing the concept of a "Reporting Entity". Currently under PMLA fine upto five lakh can be imposed, the proposed amendment bill proposes to do away with the limit.

Section 3 of the Act says “Whosoever directly or indirectly attempts to indulge or knowingly is a party or is actually involved in any process or activity connected with the proceeds of crime and projecting it as untainted property shall be guilty of offence of money laundering”. So we can say that activity or process by which tainted money of crime is projected as untainted property is money laundering. Financial institutions like banks, insurance companies, stock markets, etc are most vulnerable to money laundering activities of criminals and other anti social elements and therefore the need to insulate these institutions from the effect of laundered money. This is intended to be achieved by implementation of Know Your Customers (KYC) policy, and Customer Due Diligence guidelines across the financial sector. KYC instructions have been issued by the RBI to all the Banking companies, Financial Institutions and Intermediary to verify the identity of the clients and track the suspicious movement of illegitimate funds

The objective of KYC and CDD guidelines is to enable the managers to examine and assess their customer's financial dealings from anti-money laundering perspective, so as to make a proper risk assessment for preventing the tainted money from entering the institution and report the suspicious transaction immediately.

Formulation of KYC and CDD Guidelines and procedures specifying the objective of KYC framework by regulators like the RBI, the SEBI and IRDA are designed for appropriate customer identification, and to monitor transactions of suspicious nature. Risk Management and Monitoring Procedures have been specifically stated for having a system at ground level to exercise caution against the transaction suspected to be involving laundered money and for its identification and reporting to the FIU-IND through periodic reports.

Regulatory authorities on the basis of these guidelines and requirements under PMLA have issued instructions on KYC & CDD, to give proper effect to the said law in the financial sector. As already stated above as per the guidelines issued, financial institutions should undertake CDD measures, for establishing the identity of the customer by proper verification, particularly when initiating business relation, or carrying out occasional transaction, beyond the applicable threshold limit, or when there is a suspicion of money laundering or terrorist financing, or there is a doubt about the veracity or adequacy of previously obtained customer identification data.

Compliance with these standards of KYC and CDD by the financial institutions has been made mandatory through instructions issued by concerned regulators. These guidelines are essentially in the nature of filters having been introduced, and being operated at all the important entry points to the economy like bank, insurance, stock market. Penal provisions have been made in the Act in case the Banks and Financial Institutions fail to maintain proper record of the client and send required information to the Regulating Agency.

As the offence of money laundering is a serious offence threatening not only the financial health of the country but also its integrity and unity, the Central Government has been mandated vide section 43 of the Act to constitute special courts in consultation with the Chief Justice of High Court for speedy trial of money laundering cases.

In order to prevent vexatious search in the garb of preventing money laundering, any authority or officer exercising powers under this Act or any rules made there under, who without reasons recorded in writing searches or cause to be searched any building or place or detains or searches or arrests any person, shall for every such offence be liable on conviction for imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years or fine which may extend to fifty thousand rupee or both.

CONCEPT ON BASEL - I

OBJECTIVES

After going through this Chapter, the student would have some understanding of the following-

- The Basel Accord 1988 (Base I)
- Definition/Clarification of 'Bank' for the purpose of Basel accord, Commercial banks and Universal banks
- Shift from a 'Credit risk only' position which existed during 1988-1998
- Market risk - Recognition of the need for capital - Amendment of Basel I in 1996
- Commercial Banks & Securities firms - Universal Banks
- Segregation of Banking book & Trading book for holding Capital
- Banks to have independent Risk Management function and satisfy the 'Regulator' regarding its risk management practices

INTRODUCTION

As on date the provisions of Basel Accord of 1988 has undergone a number of changes made year after year. Though Basel II accord has become operational some of the covenants of Basel I (1988) are still relevant. Under the 1988 accord, Banks and security firms have been given different treatment. In the ensuing paragraphs we will focus on these developments.

THE BASEL ACCORD (BASEL I)

In 1988, the Basel Committee published a set of minimal capital requirements for banks. These became law in G-10 countries in 1992, with Japanese banks being permitted an extended transition period. The requirements have come to be known as the 1988 Basel Accord.

What is a 'Bank' for the purpose of Basel accord: To understand the scope of the 1988 accord, we need to clarify what we mean by 'bank.' This is because, some jurisdictions distinguished between banks and securities firms, and the Basel accord (Basel I) applied only to the former.

Commercial Banks and Universal Banks - Glass Steagal Act, USA (1933-1999)

Under its Glass-Steagal Act, the United States had quite some time back made a distinction between commercial banks and securities firms (investment banks or broker-dealers). Following World War II, Japan adopted a similar legal distinction. The United Kingdom also distinguished between banks and securities firms, although this was more a matter of custom than law. By comparison, Germany had a tradition of universal banking, which made no distinction between banks and securities firms. Under German law, securities firms were banks and a single regulatory authority oversaw banks. France and the Scandinavian countries had similar regimes. The USA revoked the Glass Steagal Act in 1999.

Exclusive Focus on Credit Risk During 1988-1998

The 1988 Basel Accord -Basel I- primarily addressed banking in the sense of deposit taking and lending (commercial banking under US law), so its focus was credit risk. Under this dispensation, bank assets were assigned 'risk weights.' Generally, G-10 government debt was weighted 0 per cent, G-10 bank debt was weighted 20 per cent, and other debt was weighted 100 per cent. Following this the Government of India Securities were assigned zero risk weight. Having assigned and aggregated the risk, Banks were required to hold capital equal to 8 per cent of the risk weighted value of assets. Additional rules applied to contingent obligations, such as letters of credit or derivatives.

MARKET RISK - RECOGNITION OF THE NEED FOR CAPITAL - AMENDMENT OF BASEL I IN 1996

With banks increasingly taking market risks, in the early 1990s, the Basel Committee decided to update the 1988 accord to include bank capital requirements for market risk. This would have implications for non-bank securities firms. Any capital requirements the Basel Committee adopted for banks' market risk were to be incorporated into future updates of Europe's Capital Adequacy Directive (CAD) and thereby apply to Britain's non-bank securities firms. If the same framework were extended to non-bank securities firms outside Europe, then market risk capital requirements for banks, and, securities firms could be harmonized globally. In 1991, the Basel Committee entered discussions with the International Organization of Securities Commissions (IOSCO) to jointly develop such a framework. The two organizations formed a technical committee, and work commenced in January 1992.

COMMERCIAL BANKS & SECURITIES FIRMS - UNIVERSAL BANKS

Glass Steagal Act revocation in 1999 by USA: Historically, capital requirements for banks and securities firms had served different purposes.

1. Banks

Banks were primarily exposed to credit risk. They, often held illiquid portfolios of loans supported by deposits. Such loans could be liquidated rapidly only at 'fire sale' prices. This placed banks at risk of 'runs.' If depositors feared that a bank might fail, they would withdraw their deposits. Forced to liquidate its loan portfolio, the bank would succumb to staggering losses on those sales.

Though Deposit insurance and lender-of-last-resort provisions implemented eliminated the risk of bank runs, they introduced a new problem. Depositors no longer had an incentive to consider a bank's financial viability before depositing funds. Without such marketplace discipline, regulators were forced to intervene often at huge cost to the exchequer. One solution was to impose minimum capital requirements on banks. Because of the high cost of liquidating a bank, such requirements were generally based upon the value of a bank as a going concern.

Securities Firms

The primary objective behind stipulation of capital requirements for securities firms was to protect clients who might have funds or securities on deposit with a firm. Securities firms were primarily exposed to market risk. They held liquid portfolios of marketable securities supported by secured financing such as repos. A troubled firm's portfolio could be unwound quickly at market prices. For this reason, capital requirements were based upon the liquidation value of a firm.

Capital for Banks & Securities Firms

In a nutshell, banks entailed systemic risk. It was thought then that Securities firms did not. Regulators would strive to keep a troubled bank afloat but would gladly unwind a troubled securities firm. Banks needed long-term capital in the form of equity or long-term subordinated debt. Securities firms could operate with more transient capital, including short-term subordinated debt.

SEGREGATION OF BANKING BOOK & TRADING BOOK FOR HOLDING CAPITAL

In April 1993, the Basel Committee released a package of proposed amendments to the 1988 accord. This included a document proposing minimum capital requirements for banks' market risk.

- Banks would be required to identify a trading book and hold capital for market risk under trading book and organization-wide foreign exchange exposures.
- Capital charges for the trading book would be based upon a crude value-at-risk (VaR) measure broadly consistent with a 10-day 95 per cent VaR metric. Similar to a VaR measure used by Europe's CAD, this partially recognized hedging effects but ignored diversification effects.
- Later VaR measure was changed modestly from the 1993 proposal, still reflecting a 10-day 95 per cent VaR metric. Market risk capital requirements were set equal to the greater of either the previous day's VaR, or the average VaR over the previous six days, multiplied by 3.

BANKS TO HAVE INDEPENDENT RISK MANAGEMENT FUNCTION AND SATISFY THE REGULATOR REGARDING ITS RISK MANAGEMENT PRACTICES

The Basel Committee's new proposal was adopted in 1996 as an amendment to the 1988 accord. It is known as the 1996 amendment. It went into effect in 1998.

Let Us Sum Up

The Basel Committee published a set of minimal capital requirements for banks and distinguished between banks and securities firms. Bank assets were assigned 'risk weights'. The primary purpose of capital requirements for securities firms was to protect clients who might have funds or securities on deposit with a firm.

CONCEPT ON BASEL - II

OBJECTIVES

The objectives of this unit are to familiarize the readers with:

- Pillar I - Minimum Capital requirement for Credit risk, Market risk and Operational risk
- Pillar II - Supervisory review process - Capital adequacy assessment
- Pillar III - Market discipline [Transparency and Disclosure requirement by banks]

INTRODUCTION

The Basel Committee replaced the 1988 accord (amended in 1996 and adopted in 1998) in April 2006. This has been dubbed Basel II. It includes more sophisticated treatment of credit risk. Basel II also addressed 'Operational risk', among other things.

BASEL I WAS BASED ON UNIFORM ASSESSMENT METHODOLOGY FOR CAPITAL ADEQUACY

Basel II is based on 3 pillars as mentioned below: Pillar - I Minimum Capital requirements

Pillar - II Supervisory Review Process

Pillar - III Market Discipline

PILLAR - I MINIMUM CAPITAL REQUIREMENTS

A bank will have to determine the proportion of its capital that it must keep in reserve based on this calculation:

$$\frac{\text{Total Capital (Unchanged)}}{\text{Credit Risk+Market Risk+Operational Risk}} = \text{The Bank's Capital Ratio nor} = 8\%$$

[9% for India]

Credit risk capital is for 'Banking book'.

Market risk Capital is for 'Trading book'.

Operational risk - New rules introduced for Basel II

Market Risk Capital is for 'Trading book'.

Operational risk- New rules introduced for Basel II

PILLAR - II SUPERVISORY REVIEW PROCESS

Pillar II seeks to enhance the link between institution's [bank's] risk profile, its risk management and risk mitigation systems and its capital

Banks must ensure that they have a process in place to make sure that they hold adequate capital consistent with their risk profile and strategy.

The Internal Capital Adequacy Assessment Process [ICAAP] is the responsibility of the bank and they should own, develop and manage their risk management processes.

PILLAR - III MARKET DISCIPLINE [TRANSPARENCY & DISCLOSURES]

This sets out the 'minimum disclosure requirements for external reporting. A bank is expected to be transparent. It should disclose various information relating to its financial aspects including its risks at periodical intervals.

COMPARISON BETWEEN BASEL I AND BASEL

Introduction: In the previous paragraphs we have given the highlights of Basel I and Basel II. In this chapter we compare the two for better understanding.

Comparison between Basel I and Basel II

Basel - I (1988 and amended in 1996) – Based on Methodology for Capital Adequacy Basel - II (to be in place by 2006 in G-10)	Basel - II (to be in place by 2006 in G-10 countries and in India in 2008) - Basel II based on 3 pillars
1. Capital adequacy based on 'Risk Weighted Assets'	1. Capital adequacy based on 'Risk Weighted Assets'
2. Not risk sensitive. Prescriptive.	2. Risk sensitive.
3. All credit exposures carried risk weight of 100 per cent - except for some sovereign exposures and mortgages	3. Credit exposures carry risk weights based on credit qualities.
4. Risk Capital = Credit exposure * Risk Weights * 8 per cent	4. Risk capital: Similar to Basel I. But efficient Banks can have lesser capital than others
Implications were • Every bank had to maintain same 8 per cent capital. Thus Banks with good quality assets had no incentives. As a result credit quality had to be lowered to increase returns • Low rated exposures were subsidized by high rated exposures • No provision for economic pricing by banks	Implications are • Banks with good quality assets have incentives because they can manage with lower capital • Better quality assets requires lesser capital • Risk pricing can be done by banks based on credit risk perception • Provision exists for economic pricing by banks

Let Us Sum Up

Basel II introduced in 2006 brought in a new concept - 'Operational risk'. Basel II also introduced the idea of 3 pillars for assessing and ensuring capital adequacy of banks.

Basel II was implemented from 2006 in G-10 countries. It was implemented in India in 2008.

Study Note - 7

LAWS RELATED TO POWER SECTOR

This Study Note includes

7.1 The Indian Electricity Act, 1910

ABSTRACT

The Indian Electricity Sector has gone through a lot of metamorphosis. The three major acts concerning the electricity sector were the Indian Electricity Act, 1910, the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1948 and the Electricity Regulatory Commissions Act, 1998. With the changing times many of the acts had become passé and thus had to be reviewed. The Electricity Act 2003, enacted by the Parliament of India, received the President's assent on 26 May 2003 and came in to force on June 10, 2003. The main aim of the Act was to consolidate the laws relating to generation, transmission, distribution, trading and use of electricity and generally for taking measures conducive to development of electricity industry, promoting competition therein, protecting interest of consumers and supply of electricity to all areas, rationalisation of electricity tariff, ensuring transparent policies regarding subsidies, promotion of efficient and environmentally benign policies constitution of Central Electricity Authority, Regulatory Commissions and establishment of Appellate Tribunal and for matters connected therewith or incidental thereto. However even after many deliberations there are some major issues that were overlooked. They need to be addressed promptly so that the power sector can be truly the engine of growth for the Indian Economy. This paper will briefly try to point out the troublesome issues and will try to suggest remedial measures.

Introduction:

Electricity is one of the key inputs for the overall socio-economic development of the country. The basic responsibility of the power supply industry is to provide adequate electricity at economic cost, while ensuring reliability and quality of the supply. Despite significant progress in capacity addition since Independence, the demand for electricity continues to outstrip the supply with the result that energy and peaking shortages continue to plague the economy. With the increasing pace of economic development facilitated by the reforms initiated by the Government, the demand for power in both rural and urban areas is likely to increase rapidly in the coming years. The major task of the power sector will, therefore, be to ensure that the anticipated demand is met adequately and in a reliable and cost-effective manner.

The power sector is currently witnessing a critical phase. State Electricity Boards (SEBs) are responsible for providing electricity to the people. Most of the SEBs are cash strapped. They are not even able to earn a minimum Rate of Return (RoR) of 3% on their net fixed assets in servicing after providing for depreciation and interest charges in accordance with Section 59 of the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1948. The power sector in the country has accumulated a huge deficit, due to Central Power Generating Companies because of the deteriorating financial performance. The structure of the electricity industry in independent India was laid down by the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1948 that created the State Electricity Boards (SEBs). In their initial years, the SEBs performed yeomen service in carrying electric power everywhere, but over the years they have become unsustainable, thanks to their mismanagement and politicisation coupled with the economic and technological developments of the past decade. It is high time that the electricity industry is denationalised, and restructured on commercial principles. Even though, the legal framework was amended in 1998 to facilitate private investment in generation and transmission, respectively, it enabled private entities to sell or transmit power only through long-term contracts with state-owned entities. Such contract-driven privatisation through state-owned monopolies can have little chance of enduring success. Similarly, the setting up of regulatory commissions under the 1998 Act, though a welcome move, only had a limited impact on the state-owned monopolies. It should surprise no one that these piecemeal changes in the name of reform have not been able to arrest the deterioration of this industry.

To overcome these teething problems that the sector faces, The Electricity Act, 2003 (referred to as The Act from here on) was introduced in the Indian parliament after a lot of political debate. The Act came into force (except for section 121) on June 10, 2003 is stated to be the 'distilled wisdom' of a series of commissioned international and national consultancy studies and seminars and conferences held at the all-India level during the last three years. It replaces the three existing legislations, namely, Indian Electricity Act, 1910, the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1948 and the Electricity Regulatory Commissions Act, 1998. The objectives of the Act are to consolidate the laws relating to generation, transmission, distribution, trading and use of electricity and generally for taking measures conducive to development of electricity industry, promoting competition therein, protecting interest of consumers and supply of electricity to all areas, rationalization of electricity tariff, ensuring transparent policies regarding subsidies, promotion of efficient and environmentally benign policies, constitution of Central Electricity Authority, Regulatory Commissions and establishment of Appellate Tribunal. It is acclaimed to be the roadmap for the electricity industry, which will help hasten the pace of economic reforms in the country. When the Bill on this subject was under consideration of the standing committee of parliament, a number of issues deserved closer examination. Several of these remain unattended. The Act, which is a halfway house, raises a number of new issues, which are likely to pose serious problems in the coming years.

The new Act seeks to free up distribution, the main stumbling block in the development of India's power sector. The Act brings together laws on generation, transmission, distribution, trading and use of electricity, liberalising generation, transmission and distribution and providing for penal action for theft of power or default on payment for power consumed. Captive plants have far greater freedom under the Act. Consumers are allowed to form bulk-purchasing groups and buy power directly from generating companies, traders or distribution companies. Non-government organisations, local bodies and user organisations too can distribute power in non-urban areas, purchasing power from the supplier of their choice. Open access has been permitted in transmission. Additional, limited open access has been provided for in the case of distribution as well, although the extent of actual competition in distribution will depend on the quality of state level regulation. The Act also seeks to set up an appellate tribunal to hear complaints against the central and state level regulatory commissions and to exercise general supervision and control over these bodies.

The present paper will identify the major features of the act and will point out the major shortcomings of the Act. The first section is the introduction. The Second section deals with power generation scenario, which will look at the major development in the electricity sector over the years. The third section looks at the salient features of the act. The fourth section will look at the regulation aspect and point out some of its shortcomings in the act. The fifth section is divided in two parts wherein the first section i.e. 5.1 will look at the Open Access. The second section i.e. 5.2 will look at the implications of the act for the electricity sector. The last section is the conclusion, which will summarise the paper and put forward some issues that need to be addressed.

THE ELECTRICITY ACT, 2003

8.1 OVERVIEW-ISSUES AND CONCEPTS

'Corporate Governance' has become one of the most commonly used phrases in the current global business vocabulary. This raises the question, 'is corporate governance a vital component of successful business or is it simply another fad that will fade away over time? The notorious collapse of Enron in 2001, one of America's largest companies, has focused international attention on company failures and the role that strong corporate governance needs to play them. The UK has responded by producing the Higgs Report (2003) and the Smith Report (2003), whereas the US produced the Sarbanes – Oxley Act (2002). Nations around the world are instigating far-reaching programmes for Corporate governance reform, as evidenced by the proliferation of Corporate Governance codes and policy documents, voluntary or mandatory, both at the national and supra-national level. We believe that the present focus on corporate governance will be maintained into the future and that, over time, corporate governance issues grow in importance, rather than fade into insignificance. The phenomenal growth of interest in Corporate Governance has been accompanied by a growing body of academic research. As the discipline matures, far greater definition and clarity are being achieved concerning the nature of corporate governance. In this chapter we consider the broad-ranging nature of corporate governance and the many ways of defining the subject. We discuss Corporate Governance from a theoretical perspective.

Concept and Definition

There is no single, accepted definition of Corporate Governance. There are substantial differences in definition according to which country we are considering. Arriving at 'a' definition of Corporate Governance is no easy task. Corporate Governance as a discipline in its own right is relatively new. We consider that the subject may be treated in a narrow or a broad manner, depending on the viewpoint of the policy maker, practitioner, researcher or theorist. It seems that existing definitions of Corporate Governance fall on to a spectrum, with 'narrow' views at one end and more inclusive, 'broad' views placed at the other. Once approach toward Corporate Governance adopts a narrow view, where Corporate Governance is restricted to the relationship between a company and its shareholders. This is the traditional finance paradigm, expressed in 'agency theory'. At the other end of the spectrum, corporate governance may be seen as a web of relationships, not only between a company and its owners (shareholders) but also between a company and a broad range of other 'stakeholders': employees, customers, supplies, bondholders, to name but a few. such a view tends to be expressed in 'stakeholder theory'. This is a more inclusive and broad way of treating the subject of corporate governance and one which is gradually attracting greater attention.

Corporate governance is...

- The process of supervision and control intended to ensure that the company's management acts in accordance with the interests of shareholders (Parkinson, 1994). – Strongly agree
- The governance role is not concerned with the running of the business of the company per se, but with giving overall direction to the enterprise, with overseeing and controlling the executive actions of management and with satisfying legitimate expectations of accountability and regulation by interests beyond the corporate boundaries (Tricker, 1984). – Agree
- The governance of an enterprise is the sum of those activities that make up the internal regulation of the business in compliance with the obligations placed on the firm by legislation, ownership trusteeship of assets, their management and their deployment (Cannon, 1994). – Agree
- The relationship between shareholders and their companies and the way in which shareholders act to encourage best practice (e.g., by voting at AGMs and by regular meetings with companies' senior management). Increasingly, this includes shareholder 'activism' which involves a campaign by a shareholder or a group of shareholders to achieve change in companies (The Corporate Governance Handbook, 1996). – Some agreement
- The structures, process, cultures and systems that engender the successful operation of the Organization (Keasey and Wright, 1993). – Some agreement
- The system by which companies are directed and controlled (The Cadbury Report, 1992) – slight agreement

We consider some published definitions of corporate governance each of which adopt a different view of the subject and provide a consensus on the relative importance of these definitions. These definitions were not intended to discriminate completely between different views, but rather each was chosen to emphasize slightly different interpretations of the Corporate Governance function. The selection represents a range of definitions, starting from the narrowest which described the basic role of Corporate Governance (The Cadbury Report, 1992; see also, Cadbury, 2002) to a solely financial perspective involving only shareholders and company management (Parkinson, 1994) and extending to a broader definition that encompassed corporate accountability to a wide range of stakeholders and society at large (Tricker, 1984). We also included a definition that emphasized the importance of shareholder activism, as this allowed us to gauge institutional investors' views on their own role in Corporate Governance (The Corporate Governance Handbook, 1996). The selection also included definitions that were regulation-centered (Cannon, 1994) or focused on corporate success (Keasey and Wright, 1993). The definitions are ranked according to the institutional investors' views of their relative importance.

In general the definitions of Corporate Governance found in the literature tend to share certain characteristics, one of which is the notion of accountability. Narrow definitions are oriented around corporate accountability to shareholders. Some narrower, shareholder-oriented definitions of Corporate Governance focus specifically on the ability of a country's legal system to protect minority shareholder rights (e.g., La Porta et al., 1998). However, such definitions are mainly applicable to cross-country comparisons of Corporate Governance. We return to the legal influence on different systems of corporate governance around the world.

Broader definitions of Corporate Governance stress a broader level of accountability to shareholders and other stakeholders. We can see that Tricker's (1984) definition, encompassing accountability to a broader group of people than just the shareholders. This demonstrates an interest within the financial community in a broader, stakeholder-oriented approach to Corporate Governance. The broadest definitions consider that companies are accountable to the whole of society, future generations and the natural world. Relatively broad, definitions consider that companies are accountable to the whole of society, future generations and the natural world. We suggest that corporate governance is the system of checks and balances, both internal and external to companies, which ensures that companies discharge their accountability to all their stakeholders and act in a socially responsible way in all areas of their business activity.

Theoretical frameworks that suggest companies should be accountable only to their shareholders are not necessarily inconsistent with theoretical frameworks that champion stakeholder accountability. The reason underlying this argument is that shareholders' interest can only be satisfied by taking account of stakeholder interests, as companies that are accountable to all of their stakeholders are over the long term more successful and more prosperous. Definition of Corporate Governance therefore rests on the perception that companies can maximize value creation over the long term, by discharging their accountability to all of their stakeholders and by optimizing their system of Corporate Governance.

Overall, this perception is growing among the professional community and academic research is beginning to provide empirical in support of this view of corporate governance, accountability and corporate profitability. However, this is the 'business case' for corporate governance and, more generally, for corporate social responsibility. Should companies improve corporate governance and discharge accountability to all of their stakeholders purely because it is ethical? We discuss these ethical issues in the subsection on stakeholder theory. In the real world, it is unlikely that businessmen and investors will be interested in acting ethically unless there are positive financial returns to be made from so doing, as there appears to be a strong business case underlying corporate governance reform and stakeholder accountability, then the corporate and financial communities are more likely to embrace these approaches.

8.2 CORPORATE GOVERNANCE PRACTICES/CODES IN - UK, GERMANY, JAPAN, INDIA AND USA

CORPORATE GOVERNANCE IN THE UK

The UK has a well-developed market with a diverse shareholder base including institutional investors, financial institutions, and individuals. The UK illustrates well the problems that may be associated with the separation of the ownership and control of corporations and hence has many of the associated agency problems. These agency problems, including misuse of corporate assets by directors and a lack of effective control over, and accountability of, directors' actions, contributed to a number of financial scandals in the UK.

As in other countries, the development of corporate governance in the UK was initially the findings of a trilogy of codes: the Cadbury Report (1992), the Greenbury Report (1995), and the Hampel Report (1998).

Figure illustrates the development of corporate governance in the UK. The centre oval represents the Combined Code published in 2008 by the Financial Reporting Council. Around the centre oval, we can see the various influences since 1998 (the original Combined Code, published in 1998, encompassed the Cadbury, Greenbury, and Hampel report recommendations). These influences can be split into four broad areas. First, there are reports that have looked at specific areas of Corporate Governance: the Turnbull Report on Internal Controls the Myners review of Institutional Investment, the Higgs Review of the role and effectiveness of non-executive directors, and the Smith Review of Audit Committees. Secondly, there has been the influence of institutional investors and their representative groups. Thirdly, influences affecting the regulatory framework within which corporate governance in the UK operates have included the UK company law review, the Walker Review for HM Treasury and the Financial Services Authority Review. Fourthly, there have been what might be termed 'external influences' such as the EU review of company law and the US Sarbanes-Oxley Act. Each of these is now discussed in turn.

Cadbury Report (1992)

Following various financial scandals and collapses (Coloroll and Polly Peck, to name but two) and a perceived general lack of confidence in the financial reporting of many UK companies, the Financial Reporting Council, the London Stock Exchange, and the accountancy profession established the Committee on the Financial Aspects of Corporate Governance in May 1991. After the Committee was set up, the scandals at BCCI and Maxwell happened, and as a result, the committee interpreted its remit more widely and looked beyond the financial aspects to Corporate Governance as a whole. The Committee was chaired by Sir Adrian Cadbury and, when the Committee reported in December 1992, the report became widely known as 'the Cadbury Report'.

The recommendations covered: the operation of the main board; the establishment, composition, and operation of key board committees; the importance of, and contribution that can be made by, non-executive directors; the reporting and control mechanisms of a business. The Cadbury Report recommended a code of Best Practice with which the boards of all listed companies registered in the UK should comply, and utilized a 'comply or explain' mechanism. This mechanism means that a company should comply with the code but, if it cannot comply with any particular aspect of it, then it should explain why it is unable to do so. This disclosure gives investors detailed information about any instances of non-compliance and enables them to decide whether the company's non-compliance is justified.

Greenbury Report (1995)

The Greenbury committee was set up in response to concern at both the size of directors' remuneration packages and their inconsistent and incomplete disclosure in companies' annual reports. It made, in 1995, comprehensive recommendations regarding disclosure of directors' remuneration packages. There has been much discussion about how much disclosure there should be of directors' remuneration and how useful detailed disclosures might be. Whilst the work of the Greenbury Committee focused on the directors of public limited companies, it hoped that both smaller listed companies and unlisted companies would find its recommendations useful.

Central to the Greenbury report recommendations were strengthening accountability and enhancing the performance of directors. These two aims were to be achieved by (i) the presence of a remuneration committee comprised of independent non-executive directors who would report fully to the shareholders each year about the company's executive remuneration policy, including full disclosure of the elements in the remuneration of individual directors; and (ii) the adoption of performance measures linking rewards to the performance of both the company and individual directors, so that the interests of directors and shareholders were more closely aligned.

Since that time (1995), disclosure of directors' remuneration has become quite prolific in UK company accounts.

Hampel Report (1998)

The Hampel Committee was set up in 1995 to review the implementation of the Cadbury and Greenbury Committee recommendations. The Hampel Committee reported in 1998. The Hampel Report said: 'We endorse the overwhelming majority of the findings of the two earlier committees'. There has been much discussion about the extent to which a company should consider the interests of various stakeholders, such as employees, customers, suppliers, providers of credit, the local community, etc., as well as the interests of its shareholders. The Hampel report stated that the directors as a board are responsible for relations with stakeholders; but they are accountable to the shareholders'. However, the report does also state that directors can meet their legal duties to shareholders, and can pursue the objective of long-term shareholder value successfully, only by developing and sustaining these stakeholder relationships'.

The Hampel Report, like its precursors, also emphasized the important role that institutional investors have to play in the companies in which they invest (investee companies). It is highly desirable that companies and institutional investors engage in dialogue and that institutional investors make considered use of their shares in other words, institutional investors should consider carefully the resolutions on which they have a right to vote and reach a decision based on careful thought, rather than engage in 'box ticking'.

Combined Code (1998)

The Combined Code drew together the recommendations of the Cadbury, Greenbury, and Hampel reports. It has two sections, one aimed at Companies and another aimed at Institutional Investors. The combined code operates on the 'comply or explain' basis mentioned above. In relation to the internal controls of the business, the combined code states that 'the board should maintain a sound system of internal control to safeguard shareholders' investment and the company's assets' and that 'the directors should, at least annually, conduct a review of the effectiveness of the group's system of internal control and should report to shareholders that they have done so. The review should cover all controls, including financial, operational, and compliance controls and risk management'. The Turnbull Report issued in 1999 gave directors guidance on carrying out this review.

Turnbull (1999)

The Turnbull Committee, chaired by Nigel Turnbull, was established by the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales (ICAEW) to provide guidance on the implementation of the internal control requirements of the Combined Code. The Turnbull Report confirms that it is the responsibility of the board of directors to ensure that the company has a sound system of internal control, and that the controls are working as they should. The board should assess the effectiveness of internal controls and report on them in the annual report. Of course, a company is subject to new risks both from the outside environment and as a result of decisions that the board makes about corporate strategy and objectives. In the managing of risk, boards will need to take into account the existing internal control system in the company and also whether any changes are required to ensure that new risks are adequately and effectively managed.

Myners (2001, 2008)

The Myners report on Institutional investment, issued in 2001 by HM Treasury, concentrated more on the trusteeship aspects of institutional investors and the legal requirements for trustees, with the aim of raising the standards and promoting greater shareholder activism. For example, the Myners report expects that institutional investors should be more proactive, especially in the stance they take with underperforming companies. Some institutional investors have already shown more of a willingness to engage actively with companies to try to ensure that shareholder value is not lost by underperforming companies.

In 2007, the NAPF published the results of its review of the extent to which Pension Fund trustees were complying with the principles. The report stated 'the recommendations set out in this report provide a framework for developing further the Principles so that they remain relevant for the world in which pension fund trustees operate today'. Subsequently HM Treasury published Updating the Myners Principles: A Response to Consultation in 2008. There are six principles identified: effective decision-making; clear objectives; risk and liabilities; performance assessment; responsible ownership; transparency; and reporting. The report emphasized greater industry ownership of the principles and places the onus on trustees to report on their own practices.

Higgs (2003)

The Higgs Review, chaired by Derek Higgs, reported in January 2003 on the role and effectiveness of non-executive directors. Higgs offered support for the Combined Code whilst making some additional recommendations. These recommendations included : stating the number of meetings of the board and its main committees in the annual report, together with the attendance records of individual directors; that a chief executive director should not also become chairman of the same company; non-executive directors should meet as a group at least once a year without executive directors being present, and the annual report should indicate whether such meetings have occurred; chairmen and chief executives should consider implementing executive development programmes to train and develop suitable individuals in their companies for future director roles; the board should inform shareholders as to why they believe a certain individual should be appointed to a non-executive directorship and how they may meet the requirements of the role; there should be a comprehensive induction programme for new non-executive directors, and resources should be available for ongoing development of directors; the performance of the board, its committees and its individual members, should be evaluated at least once a year, the annual report should state whether these reviews are being held and how they are conducted; a full time executive director should not hold more than one non-executive directorship or become chairman of a major company; no one non-executive director should sit on all three principal board committees (audit, remuneration, nomination). There was substantial opposition to some of the recommendations but they nonetheless helped to inform the Combined Code. Good practice suggestions from the Higgs Report were published in 2006.

Following a recommendation in chapter 10 of the Higgs Review, a group led by Professor Laura Tyson, looked at how companies might utilize broader pools of talent with varied skills and experience, and different perspectives to enhance board effectiveness. The Tyson report was published in 2003.

the Smith Review of Audit Committees, a group appointed by the Financial reporting council, reported in January 2003. The review made clear the important role of the audit committee: 'While all directors have a duty to act in the interests of the company, the audit committee has a particular role, acting independently from the executive, to ensure that the interests of shareholders are properly protected in relation to financial reporting and internal control'. The review defined the audit committee's role in terms of a high-level overview-it needs to satisfy itself that there is an appropriate system of controls in place but it does not undertake the monitoring itself.

Combined Code (2003)

The revised Combined Code, published in July 2003, incorporated the substance of the Higgs and Smith reviews. However, rather than stating that no one non-executive director should sit on all three board committees, the Combined Code stated that 'undue reliance' should not be placed on particular individuals. The Combined Code also clarified the roles of the Chairman and the Senior Independent director (sid), emphasizing the Chairman's role in providing leadership to the non-executive directors and in communicating shareholders' views to the board; it also provided for a 'formal and rigorous annual evaluation' of the board's, the committees', and the individual directors' performance. At least half the board in larger listed companies was to be independent non-executive directors.

Revised Turnbull Guidance (2005)

In 2005, revised guidance on the Turnbull Report (1999) was published. There were few substantive changes but boards were encouraged to review their application of the guidance on a continuing basis and to look on the internal control statement as an opportunity to communicate to their shareholders how they manage risk and internal control. They should notify shareholders, in the annual report, of how any 'significant failings or weaknesses' in the effectiveness of the internal control system have been dealt with.

Combined Code (2006)

An updated version of the Combined Code was issued in June 2006. There were three main changes made:

- (i) to allow the company chairman to serve on (but not to chair) the remuneration committee where he is considered independent on appointment as chairman;
- (ii) to provide a 'vote withheld' option on proxy appointment forms to enable a shareholder to indicate that they wish to withhold their vote;
- (iii) to recommend that companies publish on their website the details of proxies lodged at general meetings where votes were taken on a show of hands.

Combined Code (2008)

The findings of the Financial Reporting Council (FRC) Review of the Impact of the Combined Code were published in December 2007. The overall findings indicated that the Combined Code (2006) had general support and that the FRC would concentrate on improving the practical application of the Combined Code.

In June 2008, the FRC published a new edition of the Combined Code which introduced two changes. These changes were (i) to remove the restriction on an individual chairing more than one FTSE 100 company; and (ii) for listed companies outside the FTSE 350, to allow the company chairman to sit on the audit committee where he or she was considered independent on appointment.

The FRC stated on their website that The revised Code took effect at the same time as new FSA Rules implementing EU requirements relating to corporate governance statements and audit committees. The revised code and new rules will apply to accounting periods beginning on or after 29 June 2008. In practice this means most companies will begin to apply them in 2009, and will report against them for the first time in 2010.

Revised Smith Guidance (2008)

A new edition of the guidance was issued in October 2008. The main changes to the guidance as detailed on the FRC website are:

Audit committees are encouraged to consider the need to include the risk of the withdrawal of their auditor from the market in their risk evaluation and planning; companies are encouraged to include in the audit committee's report information on the appointment, reappointment or removal of the auditor, including supporting information on tendering frequency, the tenure of the incumbent auditor and any contractual obligations that acted to restrict the committee's choice of auditor; a small number of detailed changes have been made to the section dealing with the independence of the auditor, to bring the guidance in line with the Auditing Practices Board's Ethical Standards [2004, revised 2008] for auditors, which have been issued since the guidance was first published in 2003; and an appendix has been added containing guidance on the factors to be considered if a group is contemplating employing firms from more than one network to undertake the audit.

Institutional Investors and their Representative Groups

Large institutional investors, mainly insurance companies and pension funds, usually belong to one of two representative bodies that act as a professional group 'voice' for their views: the Association of British Insurers (ABI) and the national association of Pension Funds (NAPF). Both the ABI and the NAPF have best practice Corporate Governance guidelines that encompass the recommendations of the Combined Code. They monitor the corporate governance activities of companies and provide advice to members.

Some large institutional investors are very active in their own right in terms of their corporate governance activities. Hermes is a case in point, and it has published the hermes Principles, which detail how it perceives its relationship with the companies in which it invests (investee companies), what its expectations are of investee companies, and what investee companies can expect from hermes.

Companies Act 2006

In the UK, the corporate law has been in need of a thorough review for some years and the Modern Company Law Review culminated in July 2002 in the publication of out line proposals for extensive modernization of company law, including various aspects of corporate governance. These proposals included: statutory codification of directors' common law duties; enhanced company reporting and audit requirements, including a requirement that economically significant companies produce an annual operating and financial review; disclosure on corporate websites of information relating to the annual report and accounts, and disclosure relating to voting.

The government published the Company Law Reform Bill in November 2005, and the Companies Act 2006 was enacted in late 2006. The Act updates previous Companies' Acts legislation, but does not completely replace them, and it contains some significant new provisions which impacts on various constituents including directors, shareholders, auditors and company secretaries. The act draws on the findings of the Company Law Review proposals'.

The main features are as follows:

- directors' duties are codified;
- companies can make greater use of electronic communications for communicating with shareholders;
- directors can file service addresses on public record rather than their private home addresses;
- shareholders will be able to agree limitations on directors' liability;
- there will be simpler model Articles of Association for private companies, to reflect the way in which small companies operate;
- private companies will not be required to have a company secretary;
- private companies will not need to hold an annual general meeting unless they agree to do so;
- the requirement for an operating and Financial review (OFR) has not been reinstated, rather companies are encouraged to produce a high quality Business Review;
- nominee shareholders can elect to receive information in hard copy form or electronically if they wish to do so;
- shareholders will receive more timely information;
- enhanced proxy rights will make it easier for shareholders to appoint theirs to attend and vote at general meetings;
- shareholders of quoted companies may have a shareholder proposal (resolution);
- circulated at the company's expense if received by the financial year end;
- whilst there has been significant encouragement over a number of years to encourage institutional investors to disclose how they use their votes, the act provides a power which could be used to require institutional investors to disclose how they have voted.

Overall there seems to be an increasing burden for quoted companies whilst on the other hand the burden seems to have been reduced for private companies. In terms of the rights of shareholders these are enhanced in a number of ways including greater use of electronic communications, more information, enhanced proxy rights, and provision regarding the circulation of shareholder proposals at the company's expense. Equally there is a corresponding emphasis on shareholders' responsibilities with encouragement for institutional shareholders to be more active and to disclose how they have voted.

Financial Services Authority

In September 2002, the Financial Services Authority (FSA) launched a review of the listing regime with the main aim being to assess the existing rules and identify which should be retained, and which changed. The areas covered by the review were: Corporate Governance; continuing obligations (encompassing corporate communication, and shareholders' rights and obligations); financial information; the sponsor regime.

The FSA Review took place against the background of potentially significant changes in both the EU and UK regulatory environments, and although some changes were made, there was much continuity in the proposals introduced in 2005.

Following the global banking crisis, Lord Adair Turner, Chairman of the FSA, was asked by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to carry out a review and make recommendations for reforming UK and international approaches to the way banks are regulated. The Turner Review was published in the Spring 2008. Issues highlighted include remuneration policies designed to avoid incentives for undue risk taking; whether changes in governance structure are needed to increase the independence of risk management functions; and consideration of the skill and time commitment required for non-executive directors of large complex banks to effectively perform their role.

Financial Reporting Council

The Financial Reporting Council (FRC) has six operating bodies: the Accounting Standards Board (ASB), the Auditing Practices Board (APB), the Board for Actuarial Standards (BAS), the Professional oversight Board, the Financial Reporting Review Panel (FRRP), and the Accountancy and Actuarial Discipline Board (AADB).

The importance placed on corporate governance is evidenced by the fact that, in March 2004, the FRC set up a new committee to lead its work on corporate governance.

Overall, the FRC is responsible for promoting high standards of corporate governance. It aims to do so by:

- maintaining an effective Combined Code on Corporate Governance and promoting its widespread application;
- ensuring that related guidance, such as that on internal control, is current and relevant;
- influencing EU and Global Corporate Governance developments;
- helping to promote boardroom professionalism and diversity;
- encouraging constructive interaction between company boards and institutional shareholders.

The FRC has carried out several consultative reviews of the Combined Code which led to the amended Combined Code in 2006, and subsequently in 2008 (discussed earlier). The latest review took place in 2008. The frequency of the reviews are both an indicator of the FRC's responsibility for corporate governance of UK companies which involves leading public debate in the area and its response to the global financial crisis which has, in turn, affected confidence in aspects of corporate governance.

The FRC website mentions the independent review of the governance of banks and other financial institutions carried out by Sir David Walker. The Walker Review published its draft recommendations in July 2009, some of the recommendations could be taken forward through amendments to the Combined Code. The FRC is considering the extent to which the Walker Review recommendations may be applicable for some or all listed companies in other sectors.

'External' Influences

The report of the EU High Level Group of Company Law Experts had implications for company law across Europe including the UK, and is further discussed below in the context of an international development. The impact of recent legislation in the USA, the Sarbanes Oxley Act, has also made its influence felt in the UK, and is also discussed in detail below.

CORPORATE GOVERNANCE IN GERMANY

Charkham (1994) stated that 'if there were a spectrum with "confrontation" at one end and "co-operation" at the other, we would confidently place German attitudes and behaviour far closer to the "co-operation" end than, say, those of the British or Americans'. This is an important statement in the context of understanding the philosophy of the German approach to business and to companies, whereby the shareholders are but one of a wider set of stakeholder interest with the employees and customers being given more emphasis. Charkham (1994) finds this approach evidenced in the industrial relations of German companies: 'Good industrial relations . . . would not be prominent in works on corporate governance systems in most countries, or at best would be regarded as peripheral. In Germany, however, good industrial relations are much nearer centre stage.' This is evidenced in the Works Constitution Act 1972, which sets out the rights of the works council and, broadly speaking, deals with all matters pertaining to the employees' conditions of employment. Works councils are part of the co-operative process between workers and employers, the idea being that co-determination (the right to be kept informed about the company's activities and to participate in decisions that may affect the workers) means that there is a basis for more trust and co-operation between workforce and employers. The Co-determination Act 1976 defines the proportion of employee and shareholder representatives on the supervisory board (Aufsichtsrat) and also stipulates that the management board has special responsibility for labour-related matters.

The business structure in Germany is detailed in Wymeersch (1998) where he identifies the most used business types in various continental European states. In Germany, as far as the larger business entities are concerned, the business types tend to be either public (Aktiengesellschaft AG) or private companies limited by shares (Gesellschaft mit beschränkter Haftung, GmbH). However, he identifies a hybrid that is also used in Germany- specifically, a hybrid of the GmbH & Co. KG, combining the advantages of the unincorporated Kommanditgesellschaft and the limited liability of GmbH.

In Germany, as in many continental European countries and the UK, there is a trend away from individual share ownership. The most influential shareholders are financial and non-financial companies, and there are significant cross-holdings, which mean that when analysing share ownership and control in Germany, one needs to look also at the links between companies. Banks, and especially a few large banks, play a central role in German corporate governance with representation on the supervisory boards of companies and links with other companies. Charkham (1994) identifies a number of reasons as to why banks are influential in Germany. First, there is direct ownership of company shares by banks; second, German shareholders generally lodge their shares with banks authorized to carry out their voting instructions (deposited share voting rights, or DSVR); third, banks tend to lend for the long term and hence develop a longer term relationship with the company (relationship lending); fourth, banks offer a wide range of services that the company may find it useful to draw upon. Given these factors, banks tend to build up a longer term, deeper relationship with companies, and their expertise is welcomed on the supervisory boards. hence the German corporate governance system could be termed an 'insider' system.

The German Corporate Governance system is based around a dual board system, and essentially, the dual board system comprises a management board (Vorstand) and a supervisory board (Aufsichtsrat). The management board is responsible for managing the enterprise. Its members are jointly accountable for the management of the enterprise and the chairman of the management board co-ordinates the work of the management board. On the other hand, the supervisory board appoints, supervises, and advises the members of the management board and is directly involved in decisions of fundamental importance to the enterprise. The chairman of the supervisory board co-ordinates the work of the supervisory board. The members of the supervisory board are elected by the shareholders in general meetings. The co-determination principle provides for compulsory employees representation. So, for firms or companies which have more than five hundred or two thousand employees in Germany, employees are also represented in the supervisory board which then comprises one-third employee representative or one-half employee representative respectively. The representatives elected by the shareholders and representatives of the employees are equally obliged to act in the enterprise's best interests.

The idea of employee representation on boards is not always seen as a good thing because the employee representatives on the supervisory board may hold back decisions being made that are in the best interests of the company as a whole but not necessarily in the best interests of the employees as a group. An example, would be where a company wishes to rationalize its operations and close a factory but the practicalities of trying to get such a decision approved by employee representatives on the supervisory board, and the repercussions of such a decision on labour relations, prove too great for the strategy to be made a reality.

The committee on corporate governance in Germany was chaired by dr Gerhard cromme and is usually referred to as the Cromme Report or Cromme Code. The code harmonizes a wide variety of laws and regulations and contains recommendations and also suggestions for complying with international best practice on Corporate Governance.

The Cromme Code was published in 2002 and is split into a number of sections, starting with a section on shareholders and the general meeting. The Cromme Code also reflects some of the latest developments in technology. The Cromme Code was amended in 2005. Whilst it remains substantially the same, there are some significant changes, which are shown in bold in the relevant sections (i)-(vi) below.

(i) Shareholders and the general meeting

At the general meeting, the management board submits the annual, and consolidated, financial statement, and the general meeting decides on the appropriation of net income and approves the decisions of the management board and the supervisory board. An important aspect of the general meeting is that it elects the shareholders representatives to the supervisory board and also, generally, the auditors.

Interestingly, the Cromme Code makes explicit provision that the management board shall not only provide the report and accounts and other documents required by law for the general meeting but should also publish them on the company's website together with the agenda. Similarly, the use of technology is encouraged as the general meeting should be capable of being followed on the internet or similar media.

The shareholders' right to vote is facilitated in a number of ways, including by the personal exercise of shareholders voting rights, and by the use of proxies.

(ii) Co-operation between the management board and the supervisory board

It is essential that the management board and the supervisory board co-operate closely for the benefit of the enterprise. The Cromme Code defines the management board's role as to co-ordinate the enterprise's strategic approach with the supervisory board and to discuss the implementation of strategy with the supervisory board at regular intervals. There are certain situations, such as those relating to the enterprise's planning, business development, risk situation, and risk management, when the management board should inform the supervisory board immediately of any issues.

The supervisory board is able to specify the management board's information and reporting duties in more detail. It is essential that there is open discussion between the management board and supervisory board as well as amongst the members within each of those two boards. The management board and the supervisory board report each year on the enterprise's corporate governance in the annual report and they should explain any deviations from the Cromme Code. The company shall keep previous declarations of conformity with the Code available for viewing on its website for five years.

{iii) Management board

The composition of the management board is determined by the supervisory board, and should be reported in the notes to the accounts. Any conflict of interest should be disclosed to the supervisory board. The Cromme Code states that 'the management board is responsible for independently managing the enterprise' with a view to acting in the enterprise's best interest, and endeavouring to increase the sustainable value of the enterprise. As mentioned earlier, the management board develops the enterprise's strategy and co-ordinates with the supervisory board on this issue.

The Cromme Report provides for the compensation to be comprised of a fixed salary and variable component. As in many other countries, the variable compensation element should be linked to the business performance as well as long-term incentives. Stock options are mentioned as one possible element of variable compensation components and these should be linked to certain performance criteria such as the achievement of predetermined share prices.

(iv) Supervisory board

It is important that the composition of the supervisory board reflects a suitable level of knowledge, ability, and experience to be able properly to carry out the tasks relevant to the business. There should be an adequate number of independent members.

'Independence' will mean no business or personal relations with the company or its management board which cause a conflict of interest. To help maintain its independence, not more than two former members of the management board should be members of the supervisory board. the former management board chairman or a management board member should not generally become supervisory board chairman or chairman of a supervisory board committee. Supervisory board members should not have directorships or similar positions or indeed have advisory roles with important competitors of the enterprise.

The supervisory board carries out a number of important functions as follows:

- (i) it provides independent advice and supervision regularly to the management board on the management of the business;
- (ii) the management board and the supervisory board should ensure that there is a long-term succession plan in place;
- (iii) the supervisory board may delegate some duties to other committees, which include compensation and audit committees;
- (iv) the chairman of the supervisory board, who should not be the chairman of the audit committee, co-ordinates work within the supervisory board and chairs its meetings and attends to the affairs of the supervisory board externally.

It is worth elaborating on the committees that may be formed with a remit for various delegated areas. These may include the audit committee (the chairman of the audit committee should not be a former member of the management board of the company); the chairman of the audit committee should have specialist knowledge and experience in the application of accounting principles and internal control processes, and a compensation committee to look at the compensation of the management board. This committee may also look at the appointment of members of the management board.

The Cromme Code also states that members of the management board of a listed company should not be on more than five supervisory boards in non-group listed companies. The compensation of members of the supervisory board is specified either by a resolution of the general meeting or in the articles of association. Members of the supervisory board may receive performance-related compensation as well as fixed compensation. The compensation of the supervisory board members should be disclosed in the Corporate Governance Report.

An interesting disclosure required by the Cromme Code is that if a supervisory board member takes part in less than half of the meetings of the supervisory board in a financial year, then this will be noted in the report of the supervisory board. Any conflicts of interest should be reported to the supervisory board and the supervisory board would then inform the general meeting of any conflicts of interest together with how these conflicts have been treated.

(v) Transparency

The code provides that the management board should disclose immediately any facts that might affect the enterprise's activities and which are not publicly known. The report emphasizes that all shareholders should be treated equally in respect of information disclosure and that the company may use appropriate media, such as the internet, to inform the shareholders and investors in an efficient and timely manner. There is disclosure required in terms of the shareholdings, including options and derivatives, that are held by individual management board and supervisory board members. These must be reported if they directly or indirectly exceed 1 per cent of the shares issued by the company. The code also states: 'If the entire holdings of all members of the management board and supervisory board exceed 1 per cent of the shares issued by the company, these shall be reported separately according to the management board and supervisory board.' These disclosures should all be included in the corporate Governance report.

(vi) Reporting and audit of the annual financial statements

The code states that the supervisory board or the audit committee should obtain a statement from the proposed auditor clarifying whether there are any 'professional, financial or other relationships' that might call the auditor's independence into question.

Interestingly, this statement should include the extent to which other services have been performed for the company in the past year, especially in the field of consultancy, or which are contracted for the following year. It is the supervisory board that concludes agreement on the auditors fee.

From the discussion above, it can be seen that the defining feature of Germany's corporate governance system is the significant role played by the supervisory board. In addition, the supervisory board has compulsory representation of workers via the co-determination rules. This can have an important impact on key strategic decisions, for example, if a German company decides that it needs to close one of its subsidiaries, then it may prefer to close down a subsidiary overseas, in a country such as the UK, which has a unitary board structure and hence no supervisory board with employee representation. Employees in the UK would therefore be in a weaker position than their German counterparts, and have less influence over any closure decision.

It is interesting to note that Charkham (2005), in reviewing corporate governance developments in Germany, is of the opinion that 'internal and external developments have put pressure on it, but its main provisions remain intact. The factors for change have been the diminishing role of the banks, the international governance codes and principles, and the international capital markets'.

In November 2005, Germany abolished the requirement for shares to be blocked in advance of a shareholder meeting. Blocking had meant that shares could not be traded for a period of time before a company's general meeting, if the holder of the shares wished to be able to vote on the resolutions tabled for the general meeting. therefore, it had effectively been a deterrent to voting because institutional investors often could not afford to be in a position whereby they were unable to trade their shares.

Recent legal changes now require companies to disclose pay details for executive directors, effective for annual reports for 2006 onwards. However, company management may propose that disclosure is limited and if the proposal is approved by 75 per cent of its shareholders, then the additional disclosure does not have to be given. An amended version of the German corporate Governance code was published in 2006 and recommended that various executive remuneration disclosures should be made in the corporate Governance report. Companies would be obliged to disclose if they were to deviate from these recommendations.

There were minor amendments to the German Corporate Governance Code in 2007 and 2008. In the forward to each of these codes, it is mentioned that the European company or Society Europaeen (SE) gives German enterprises the opportunity to opt for the unitary board system in which case the form that co-determination would take would be a matter for agreement between the company management and the employees. Also there is now a recommendation in the section on the 'supervisory Board' that the supervisory board should form a nomination committee composed exclusively of shareholder representatives which should propose suitable candidates to the supervisory board for recommendation to the company's general meeting.

Goergen et al. (2008) review the governance role of large shareholders, creditors, the product market and the supervisory board, and also discuss the importance of mergers and acquisitions, the market in block trades, and the lack of a hostile takeover market. They find that, the German system is characterised by a market for partial corporate control, large shareholders and bank/ creditor monitoring, a two-tier (management and supervisory) board with co-determination between shareholders and employees on the supervisory board, a disciplinary product-market, and Corporate Governance regulation largely based on EU directives but with deep roots in the German codes and legal doctrine. Another important feature of the German system is its Corporate Governance efficiency criterion which is focused on the maximisation of stakeholder value rather than shareholder value. However, the German corporate governance system has experienced many important changes over the last decade. First, the relationship between ownership or control concentration and profitability has changed over time. Second, the pay- for-performance relation is unfluenced by large shareholder control: in firms with controlling blockholders and when a universal bank is simultaneously an equity- and debtholder, the pay-for-performance relation is lower than in widely-held firms or blockholder-controlled firms. Third, since 1995 several major regulatory initiatives (including voluntary codes) have increased transparency and accountability.

Odenius (2008) reviews Germany's corporate governance system and the effectiveness of recent reforms. He states that since the early 1990s far-reaching reforms have complemented the traditional stakeholder system with important elements of the shareholder system. he raises the important question of whether these reforms have created sufficient flexibility for the market to optimize its corporate governance structure within well established social and legal norms. he concludes that there is scope for enhancing flexibility in three core areas, relating to: firstly internal control mechanisms, especially the flexibility of board structures; secondly self-dealing; and thirdly external control, particularly take-over activity.

CORPORATE GOVERNANCE IN JAPAN

Japan's economy developed very rapidly during the second half of the twentieth century. Particularly during the period 1985-89, there was a 'bubble economy', characterized by a sharp increase in share prices and the value of land; the early 1990s saw the bubble burst as share prices fell and land was devalued, as well as shareholders and landowners finding themselves losing vast fortunes, banks found that they had severe problems too. During the bubble period, the banks had lent large amounts of money against the value of land and, as the repayments and the banks were left with large non-performing loans. The effect of the fall in share prices and land values spread through the Japanese economy, which became quite stagnant, and the effects spread to other countries' economies, precipitating a regional recession.

The Japanese government wished to restore confidence in the Japanese economy and in the stock market, and to attract foreign direct investment to help regenerate growth in companies. Improved corporate governance was seen as a very necessary step in this process.

Japan's Corporate Governance System is often likened to that of Germany because banks can play an influential role in companies in both countries. However, there are fundamental differences between the systems, driven partly by culture and partly by the Japanese shareholding structure with the influence of the keiretsu (broadly, associations of companies). Charkham (1994) sums up three main concepts that affect Japanese attitudes towards Corporate Governance: obligation, family, and consensus. The first of these, obligation, is evidenced by the Japanese feeling of obligation to family, a company, or country; the second, family, is the strong feeling of being part of a 'family' whether this is a family person, or a company; finally, the third concept, consensus, means that there is an emphasis on agreement rather than antagonism. These three concepts deeply influence the Japanese approach to Corporate Governance.

The keiretsu sprang out of the zaibatsu. Okumura (2002) states: 'Before World War II, when zaibatsu (giant pre-war conglomerates) dominated the Japanese economy, individuals or families governed companies as major stockholders. By contrast, after the war, by virtue of corporate capitalism, companies in the form of corporations became large stockowners, and companies became major stockholders of each other's stock.' The companies forming the keiretsu may be in different industries, forming a cluster often with a bank at the centre. Charkham (1994) states that 'banks are said to have encouraged the formation and development of groups of this kind, as a source of mutual strength and reciprocal help'. Indeed, banks themselves have a special relationship with the companies they lend to, particularly if they are the lead or main bank for a given company. Banks often buy shares in their customer companies to firm up the relationship between company and bank. However, they are limited to as per cent holding in a given company but, in practice, the combination of the traditional bank relationship with its client and the shareholding mean that they can be influential, and often very helpful, if the company is in financial difficulties, viewing it as part of their obligation to the company to try to help it find a way out of its difficulties.

When compared to the German system, it should be noted that there is no automatic provision for employees to sit on the supervisory board. However, employees have traditionally come to expect that they will have lifelong employment with the same company - unfortunately, in times of economic downturn, this can no longer be guaranteed.

The Japan Corporate Governance Committee published its revised Corporate Governance Code in 2001. The code had six chapters, which contained a total of 14 principles. The code had an interesting introduction, part of which stated 'a good company maximizes the profits of its shareholders by efficiently creating value, and in the process contributes to the creation of a more prosperous society by enriching the lives of its employees and improving the welfare of its other stakeholders'.

Summary of key characteristics influencing Japanese Corporate Governance

Feature Key characteristic

Main business form Public limited company

Predominant ownership structure Keiretsu; but institutional investor ownership is increasing

Legal system civil law

Board structure dual

Important aspect Influence of keiretsu

Hence the Code tried to take a balanced view of what a company is all about, and clearly the consideration of stakeholders is seen to be an important aspect. The foreword to the Code discussed and explained some of the basic tenets of Corporate Governance to help familiarize readers of the code with areas including the role and function of the board of directors, the supervisory body, independent directors, incentive-based compensation, disclosure, and investor relations.

(i) Mission and role of the board of directors

This first chapter contained five principles relating to: the position and purpose of the board of directors; the function and powers of the board of directors; the organization of the board of directors; outside directors and their independence; the role of the leader of the board of directors.

The board should be comprised of outside directors (someone who has never been a full-time director, executive, or employee of the company)- preferably a majority- and inside directors (executives or employees of the company). Independent directors are outside directors who can make their decisions independently. The board of directors' role is seen as one of management supervision including approving important strategic decisions, nominating candidates for director positions, appointment and removal of the CEO, and general oversight of accounting and auditing. the board of directors may also be required to approve certain decisions made by the CEO.

(ii) Mission and role of the committees established within the board of directors

The board is recommended to establish various committees including an audit committee, compensation committee, and nominating committee., Each committee established should comprise at least three directors, and an outside director appointed as chair of each committee. The majority of directors on the audit committee should be independent directors, whilst the majority of directors on the audit committee should be independent directors, whilst the majority of directors on the other two committees should be outside directors, of whom at least one should be an independent director.

The roles of the various committees are broadly defined and cover the usual areas that one would expect for each of these committees.

(iii) Leadership responsibility of the CEO

The CEO'S role is to formulate management strategies with the aim of maximizing corporate value in the long term. The CEO is supervised by the board of directors. the CEO may set up an executive management committee to assist him in conducting all aspects of the business. The CEO may not be a member of the committees listed above in (ii).

(iv) Addressing Shareholder Derivative Litigation

A litigation committee, comprised a majority of independent directors, may be established to determine whether litigation action should be made against directors or executives against whom the company/ shareholders may have a claim.

(v) Securing fairness and transparency for executive management

Two important areas were covered in this section of the Code: internal control and disclosure. The CEO should ensure that there is an effective Corporate Governance System with adequate internal control. the audit committee should evaluate the CEO's policies on internal audit and control. The CEO should prepare an annual report about the internal audit and control, which should preferably be audited by a certified public accountant.

Disclosure should be made by the CEO of any information that may influence share prices; also information should be disclosed to the various stakeholder groups as appropriate.

(vi) Reporting To The Shareholders And Communicating With Investors

The shareholders' general meeting is seen as an opportunity for shareholders to listen to the reports of the directors and executives, and to obtain further information about the company through asking questions. Should the questions go unanswered in the general meeting, then the answer should be put on the company's website subsequent to the general meeting.

The company's executives are encouraged to meet analysts and others who can convey information to investors and shareholders about the company. Information should also be posted on the internet to try to ensure equality of access to information amongst the various investors.

The Commercial Code in Japan provides for the appointment of statutory auditors to monitor the various aspects of the company's activities. However, in 2002, there was an extensive revision of the commercial code essentially providing companies with the option of adopting a 'Us-style' corporate governance structure. The US-style structure would have a main board of directors to carry out the oversight function, and involve the establishment of audit, remuneration, and nomination committees, each with at least three members, a majority of whom should be non-executive. A board of corporate executive officers would also be appointed who would be in charge of the day to-day business operations. Under the Us-style structure, the board of statutory auditors would be abolished. It can be seen that the Japanese Corporate Governance Committee's Code's recommendations dovetailed with the revised Commercial Code.

In 2004, the Tokyo Stock Exchange issued the Principles of Corporate Governance for Listed Companies. In the preface, the purpose of the Principles is described as being 'to provide a necessary common base for recognition, thereby enhancing corporate governance through the integration of voluntary activities by listed companies and demands by shareholders and investors'. The five principles are based around the OECD Principles of corporate Governance.

The first principle relates to exercising various rights of shareholders, including the right to participate and vote in general meetings, voting on such issues as the election and dismissal of directors and auditors, and fundamental corporate changes, the basic right to share various profits such as dividends, and the special right to make derivative lawsuits and injunction of activities in contravention of laws, regulations, and other rules. The voting environment should be developed and improved so that shareholders can exercise their votes appropriately and participate in general meetings of shareholders.

The second principle relates to the equitable treatment of shareholders, including minority and foreign shareholders. To this end, there should be an adequate system to prohibit transactions through the abuse of officers, employees, and controlling share holders, which are against the primary interests of the company or shareholders. There should be enhanced disclosure where it seems that such actions might occur, and there should be prohibition of special benefits to specified shareholders.

The third principle is the relationship with stakeholders in corporate governance. Whilst Corporate Governance should help to create corporate value and jobs, the fact that companies sustain and improve their strengths and enhance value over time is 'the result of the provision of company resources by all stakeholders', so the establishment of good relationships with stakeholders is important. To this end, companies should cultivate a corporate culture and internal systems, which respect the various stakeholder groups and ensure timely and accurate disclosure of information relating to them.

The fourth principle relates to disclosure and transparency. Companies should ensure timely and accurate disclosure on all material matters, including the financial state and performance of the company and ownership distribution, through both quantitative and qualitative disclosures. The company should seek to ensure that investors can access information easily and that there is equal access to information. Internal systems should seem to ensure the accuracy and timeliness of disclosure.

The final principle relates to the responsibilities of the board of directors, auditors, board of corporate auditors, and other relevant groups. corporate governance should enhance the supervision of management by the aforementioned groups and ensure their account ability to shareholders. Systems should be developed, or enhanced, to ensure that these requirements can be met.

Finally, it is important to note that the legal framework in Japan, via the Commercial Code Revision on Boards (2003), provides for two corporate governance structures: a corporate auditors' system, consisting of general meetings with shareholders, the board of directors, representative directors, executive directors, corporate auditors, and the board of corporate auditors, and a committees system, where there are general meetings of the shareholders, the board of directors, and committees composed of members of the board of directors (nomination committee, audit committee, and compensation committee), representative executive officers, and executive officers. It is up to the company which system it chooses. In each case, the general meeting of shareholders is the decision-making body on matters of fundamental importance to the company. A key difference between the two structures is that companies with a committee system need to re-elect their directors annually through the general meeting of shareholders, because the board of directors has the authority regarding the definitive plan for the distribution of profit, whereas in the corporate auditors' system, this power lies with the general meetings of shareholders.

Charkham (2005) discusses the various changes that have taken place in the context of Corporate Governance in Japan and states:

The important part the banks played has greatly diminished. In its place there are now better structured boards, more effective company auditors, and occasionally more active shareholders. an increase of interest, and, where appropriate, action on their part, might restore the balance that the banks' withdrawal from the scene has impaired.

Ahmadjian and Okumura (2006) also discuss the changes that have taken place in Japan in recent years:

Over the last decade, the debate on corporate governance has contrasted two extremes - whether to become "like the US" or retain the post-war Japanese system of governance. Yet, as we noted earlier, retaining the "traditional" post-war governance system is no longer an option, since it has been severely weakened by the demise of the role of the main bank, unwinding of cross-shareholdings, changes in accounting standards and increased investment by foreigners.

It is interesting to note that Japan is now using poison pills much more to ward off hostile takeover bids (an undesirable development), whereas it does not have the huge problems associated with perceived excessive director remuneration as its directors are not paid the vast multiples of the salary of the ordinary employees as this would be considered culturally unacceptable.

In 2008, the Asian Corporate Governance Association (ACGA) published its 'White Paper on Corporate Governance in Japan'. It states, While a number of leading companies in Japan have made strides in corporate governance in recent years, we submit that the system of governance in most listed companies is not meeting the needs of stakeholders or the nation at large in three ways:

- By not providing for adequate supervision of corporate strategy;
- By protecting management from the discipline of the market, thus rendering the development of a healthy and efficient market in corporate control all but impossible;
- By failing to provide the returns that are vitally necessary to protect Japan's social safety net- its pension system.

It then advocates six areas for improvement: shareholders acting as owners; utilizing capital efficiently; independent supervision of management; pre-emption rights; poison pills and takeover defences; shareholder meetings and voting.

CORPORATE GOVERNANCE IN INDIA

Following on from a period of economic downturn and social unrest in 1990-1, the Indian Government introduced a programme of reforms to open up the economy and encourage greater reliance on market mechanisms and less reliance on government. Further reforms were aimed at making the public sector more efficient and divestment of government holdings was initiated. There were also reforms to the banking sector to bring it into line with international norms, and to the securities market, with the Securities and Exchange Board of India (SEBI) becoming the regulator of the securities market.

The securities market was transformed as disclosure requirements were brought in to help protect shareholders' interest. Kar (2001) mentions how 'foreign portfolio investment was permitted in India since 1992 and foreign institutional investors also began to play an important role in the institutionalization of the market'. All the reforms above led to a much improved environment in which Corporate Governance was able to develop.

India has a range of business forms, including public limited companies, which are listed on the stock exchange, domestic private companies and foreign companies. Ownership data is difficult to find because the number of studies carried out in this area is few, however it is clear that, as the economy has opened up, so the institutional investors are increasing their share of the market.

The confederation of Indian industries published a Desirable Corporate Governance in India - A Code in 1998 and a number of forward-looking companies took its recommendations on board. However, many companies still had poor governance practices, which led to concerns about their financial reporting practices, their accountability, and ultimately to losses being suffered by investors, and the resultant loss of confidence that this caused.

SEBI formally established the Committee on Corporate Governance in May 1999, chaired by Shri Kumar Mangalam Birla. The Report of the Kumar Mangalam Birla Committee on Corporate Governance (hereinafter the report) was published in 2000.

The Report emphasizes the importance of corporate governance to future growth of the capital market and the economy. Three key aspects underlying corporate governance are defined as accountability, transparency, and equality of treatment for all stakeholders.

Feature	Key characteristic
Main business form	Public limited company
Predominant ownership structure	Corporate bodies; families; but institutional investors' ownership increasing

Legal system	common law
Board structure	Unitary important aspect	some aspects of the code are mandatory recommendations

The impact of corporate governance on both shareholders and stakeholders is mentioned, although the corporate objective is seen as one of maximizing shareholder value, and indeed the Committee views the fundamental objective of Corporate Governance as 'enhancement of shareholder value, keeping in view the interests of other stakeholders'. The Committee feels that companies should see the Code as 'a way of life'. The recommendations apply to all listed private and public sector companies, and are split into mandatory requirements (ones that the committee sees as essential for effective corporate governance) enforceable via the listing rules, and non-mandatory (but nonetheless recommended as best practice).

(i) Board of directors

This section of the code covers the composition of the board, and independent directors. The board provides leadership and strategic guidance for the company and is at all times accountable to the shareholders. The code recommends that not less than 50 per cent of the board is comprised of non-executive directors; where there is a non-executive chairman, then at least one-third of the board should comprise independent directors, but where there is an executive chairman, then at least half of the board should be independent. The latter recommendation is mandatory.

(ii) Nominee directors

The Indian system allows for nominee directors to be put forward by financial or investment institutions to safeguard their investment in the company. The Code decided to allow this practice to continue, but stated that such nominees should have the same responsibility as other directors and be accountable to the shareholders generally.

(iii) Chairman of the Board

Whilst recognizing that the roles of chairman and chief executive are different, the code recognizes that the roles may be combined and performed by one individual in some instances,

(iv) Audit Committee

There are a number of mandatory recommendations in the code in relation to audit committees, including the recommendation that a qualified and independent audit committee is established to help to enhance confidence in the company's disclosures. The committee should comprise a minimum of three members, all of whom are non-executive, with a majority being independent; it should be chaired by an independent director. At least one director should have appropriate financial knowledge. The audit committee is empowered to seek external advice as appropriate, and interestingly, to seek information from any employee.

(v) Remuneration Committee

A remuneration committee should be established to make recommendations on executive directors' remuneration. The committee should be comprised of at least three non-executive directors, and chaired by an independent director. A mandatory requirement is that there should be disclosures in the annual report relating to 'all elements of remuneration package of all the directors, i.e. salary, benefits, bonuses, stock options, pension, etc.' together with 'details of fixed component and performance-linked incentives, along with performance criteria'. Finally, another mandatory requirement is that the board of directors should decide the remuneration of the non-executive directors.

(vi) Board Procedures

Mandatory requirements in relation to board meetings are: first, that they should be held at least four times a year with a maximum of four months between any two meetings; second, that a director should not be involved in more than ten committees or act as chairman of more than five committees across all companies with which he is a director.

(vii) Management

The role of the management of the company (chief executive, executive directors, and key management personnel) in ensuring the smooth running of the day-to-day activities of the company is emphasized. A mandatory recommendation is that there should be disclosure in the annual report, either as part of the directors' report, or as a 'management discussion and analysis' report, about the company's position, its outlook, performance, and other relevant areas of interest to shareholders. There should also be disclosure of any material financial/commercial transactions in which management has a personal interest that may have a potential conflict with the interest of the company.

(viii) Shareholders

Shareholders are entitled to be able to participate effectively in the annual general meeting. Therefore, in support of this aim, it is a mandatory recommendation that, on the appointment of new, or reappointment of existing, directors, the shareholders are provided with relevant information about the director(s). Similarly, companies are mandated to disclose information, including their quarterly results and presentations, to company analysts which may be made available via the internet.

The growing influence of institutional investors is recognized, along with the fact that they have a responsibility to exercise their votes.

(ix) Manner of Implementation

There are mandatory recommendations that a company should have a separate section on Corporate Governance in its annual report, including a detailed compliance report. Non-compliance with any mandatory recommendations should be highlighted, as should the level of compliance with non-mandatory recommendations. A company should obtain a certificate from its auditors in relation to compliance with the mandatory recommendations and it should be attached to the directors' report, which is sent each year to all the shareholders, and to the Stock Exchange.

The Indian Code is clearly rather complex having as it does a series of mandatory and non-mandatory recommendations. The feasibility of this approach will lie in a number of areas: first, the extent to which companies are willing to implement the recommendations; second, the growing influence of shareholders and how effectively they can exercise their voice; third, the approach taken by the Stock Exchange in India in terms of enforcing compliance.

Chakrabarti (2005) provides an interesting review of the evolution of Corporate Governance in India and highlights the fact that, whilst India has good Corporate Governance codes/guidelines, there is poor adoption of the recommendations in many companies. Subsequently Chakrabarti et al. (2008) state that while on paper the country's legal system provides some of the best investor protection in the world, the reality is different with slow, over-burdened courts and widespread corruption. Consequently, ownership remains highly concentrated and family business groups continue to be the dominant business model. There is significant pyramiding and tunneling among Indian business groups and, notwithstanding copious reporting requirements, widespread earnings management. However, most of India's corporate governance shortcomings are no worse than in other Asian countries and its banking sector has one of the lowest proportions of non-performing assets, signifying that corporate fraud and tunneling are not out of control.

Balasubramanian et al. (2008) provide an overview of Indian corporate governance practices, based primarily on responses to a 2006 survey of 370 Indian public companies. They find that Compliance with legal norms is reasonably high in most areas, but not complete. We identify areas where indian corporate governance is relatively strong and weak, and areas where regulation might usefully be either relaxed or strengthened. On the whole, indian corporate governance rules appear appropriate for larger companies, but could use some strengthening in the area of related party transactions, and some relaxation for smaller companies. Executive compensation is low by Us standards and is not currently a problem area. We also examine whether there is a cross sectional relationship between measures of governance and measures of firm performance and find evidence of a positive relationship for an overall governance index and for an index covering shareholder rights.

CORPORATE GOVERNANCE IN USA

The period between thursday, august 2, 2012 and saturday, august 4, 2012 was an auspicious time in the practice of internal auditing in Ghana. during that time, The Institute of Internal Auditors (Ghana), hosted Mr. Philip tarling, the 2012-2013 Global chairman of the institute of internal auditors (iia) worldwide, the first by a Global Chairman. During his visit, Mr. Tarling delivered a public lecture at the British Council Hall, Accra, on the topic “Expanding the Frontiers of Internal auditing – A perspective from the Global Chairman”. He also held sessions with key stakeholders of the profession in the country including chief executive officers, their chief internal auditors and IIA representatives from the West African Institutes. A presidential dinner was held in his honour.

The Institute of Internal Auditors is the global body for the internal audit profession. Established in 1941, The Institute of Internal Auditors (IIA) is an international professional association with global headquarters in altamonte springs, Florida, USA. The IIA is the internal audit profession’s global voice, recognized authority, acknowledged leader, chief advocate, and principal educator. Generally, members work in internal auditing, risk management, governance, internal control, information technology audit, education, and security. Historians have traced the roots of internal auditing to ancient times, as merchants verified receipts for grain brought to market. The real growth of the profession occurred in the 19th and 20th centuries with the expansion of corporate business. Demand grew for systems of control in companies conducting operations in many locations and employing thousands of people. Traditionally, internal auditing has been concerned with accounting and financial activities. Historically, internal auditing emerged to satisfy some well defined management needs in the areas of accounting and financial matters. Management needed to satisfy itself whether:

- (a) The assets of the entity were properly protected;
- (b) The policies of the entity were being complied with;
- (c) Financial records were accurate and reliable.

Additionally, prevention and detection of fraud was a major focus of management. In that environment, the internal auditor was a financially oriented person with limited responsibility in the management process. He was seen more as a policeman and a checker and less as a co-worker. Internal auditing was also seen as an extension of external auditing.

The role of the internal auditor has been changing greatly over a period of time, leading to a greater reliance on him by management and the expansion of the internal audit function. This has resulted from the complexity of modern day businesses which are taking the form of multiple multi-national business units as well as the additional demands on management from various stakeholders. Competition dictates that organizations should be managed more effectively and efficiently if they are to survive and achieve growth. There is the need to optimize business performance and obtain operational excellence through greater effectiveness and efficiency. Cost reduction schemes must be implemented. Introduction of information technology into business operations have also brought its own challenges. There is therefore the need for greater protection against inefficiency, misconduct and fraudulent and illegal practices. Along the line, the realization dawned that the internal auditor could play an enhanced role in offering expanded protection all the new challenges facing management have therefore dictated the changing role of the internal auditing. Modern internal auditing today reflects two broad roles: assurance and consulting. Today, internal auditing has moved from the more routine compliance level when it used to be integrated with regular accounting activities where it was carried out entirely or substantially only in the strictly financial areas to higher levels in all operational areas of management where it has established itself as a valued and respected part of top management practice. Apart from compliance reviews and analysis of financial information, the modern internal auditor performs other functions as the examination and assessment of risk management, emerging technologies, and global issues.

The year 1941 marked a major turning point. Victor Z. Brink authored the first major book on internal auditing. And at the same time, John B. Thurston, internal auditor for the North American Company in New York, had been contemplating establishing an organization for internal auditors. He and Robert B. Milne had served together on an internal auditing subcommittee formed jointly by the Edison Electric Institute and the American Gas Association, and they agreed that further progress in bringing internal auditing to its proper level of recognition would be best made possible by forming an independent organization for internal auditors. When Brink's book came to the attention of Thurston, the three men got together and found they had a mutual interest in furthering the role of internal auditing.

As an organizing committee, Brink, Milne, Thurston, contacted a small group of internal audit practitioners throughout the United States who expressed interest in forming a national – even international – organization for internal auditors. The IIA's certificate of incorporation was filed on November 17, 1941, and just prior to the first annual meeting on December 9, 1941, the Williams Club located at 24 East 39th Street in New York City, 24 charter members were accepted for membership. Thurston was elected as the first president of The IIA. Membership grew quickly. It went from the original 24 members to 104 by the end of the first year, to 1,018 at the end of five years. By 1957, membership had expanded to 3,700 and 20 percent were located outside of the United States. More than 70 years later, the IIA is a dynamic global organization with more than 175,000 members worldwide. Today, many people associate the genesis of modern internal auditing with the establishment of the IIA.

The Institute of Internal Auditors (Ghana) was formally registered in April 2001 in Ghana under the Professional Bodies Registration Decree, 1973 (NRCD 143) as a professional association dedicated to the promotion and development of the practice of internal auditing in Ghana. The Institute was formally inaugurated on Friday, May 13, 2005 by the then Hon. Minister of Finance & Economic Planning on behalf of His Excellency the President of the Republic of Ghana. The IIA (Ghana) is a full-fledged member institute of the Global Internal Audit family. It also actively pursues collaboration and partnership with sister national institutes, particularly the African institutes. IIA Ghana is a founding member of AFIIA – the African Federation of Institutes of Internal Audit, and currently represents West Africa on its governing council.

IIA Ghana is governed by a nine-member council supported by the immediate Past-President of the Institute who is an ex-officio member. The present Council (2011-2012) comprising the following members, was elected in February 2011 and will serve until the 2012 annual General Meeting, which will be held in February 2013:

- (a) Eric N. Yankah (President);
- (b) Richard Ntim (Vice President);
- (c) Juliet Aboagye-Wiafe (Mrs.);
- (d) Thomas M. Atuam;
- (e) Elsie Bunyan (Mrs.);

- (f) Leonard B.L. Donkoh;
- (g) Rebecca a. Lomo (Ms.)
- (h) Kofi Okofo-Dartey;
- (i) Daniel Kwame Opare;

On November 16, 2012, Institutional Shareholder Services Inc. ("ISS") released the 2013 Updates to its U.S. Corporate Governance Policy (the "2013 Updates"). The 2013 Updates will be effective for shareholder meetings on or after February 1, 2013, unless otherwise noted below.

Issues affecting advisory votes on executive compensation

Investors continue to rank executive compensation as the top corporate governance topic. the 2013 Updates to the pay-for-performance evaluation undertaken in advance of an advisory "say-on-pay" vote on executive compensation refine how the subject companies' peer groups are selected, adjusting the criteria in an effort to include within the relevant peer group companies that have more in common with the subject company. The 2013 Updates also add the concept of "realizable pay" to the qualitative analysis for large cap companies.

Peer Groups

The 2013 Updates generally retain the methodology used by iss in 2012 to evaluate a say-on-pay proposal, utilizing both a quantitative and qualitative analysis to assess the alignment between pay and performance and determine the recommendation of iss on the proposal. As part of the quantitative analysis, the previous methodology focused the selection of a peer group on the subject company's Global Industry Classification Standard ("GICS") industry group. The GICS classification, however, does not always capture the multiple business lines in which a company operates, which may lead to the omission of direct competitors from a company's peer group or the inclusion of companies without much relation to the business of the subject company.

The 2013 Updates expand the scope of companies selected for a peer group. Instead of relying on only the company's GICS classification, the 2013 Updates provide for use of the peers from the subject company's GICS group as well as from GICS industry groups represented in the peer group the company has self-selected in benchmarking its executive compensation, while maintaining approximate proportions of these industries in the final peer group. The new methodology additionally focuses initially at an 8-digit GICS level rather than more specific levels, to be better aligned in terms of industry. ISS will prioritize for inclusion peers that (a) maintain the subject company near the median of the peer group in revenue/asset size, (b) are in the subject company's peer group and (c) have chosen the subject company as a peer. iss' selection criteria will continue to focus on companies that are reasonably similar in industry profile, size and capitalization.

Other changes to the peer group methodology include using slightly relaxed size requirements, especially at very small and very large companies, and using revenue instead of assets for certain financial companies.

Realizable Pay

The 2013 Updates expand the list of qualitative factors used to analyze pay-for-performance alignment at large cap companies to include "realizable pay", which may ultimately mitigate or exacerbate pay-for-performance concerns. While the grant date pay disclosed in a company's summary compensation Table reflects the intent of the Compensation Committee's pay decisions, it does not necessarily reflect the final payouts of performance awards or changes in value due to gains or losses in the subject company's stock price.

Realizable pay will consist of the sum of relevant cash and equity-based grants and awards made during the specific performance period being measured, based on equity award values for actual earned awards, or target values for ongoing awards, calculated using the stock price at the end of the performance measurement period. Stock options and SARs will be re-valued using the remaining term and updated assumptions, as of the performance period, using the Black-Scholes option pricing model.

Golden Parachute Proposals

The Dodd-Frank Act requires companies to hold separate shareholder votes on potential “golden parachute” payments when they seek approval for mergers, sales and certain other transactions. In determining the recommendation with respect to a golden parachute proposal, the 2013 Updates include the consideration of any existing change-in-control arrangements maintained with named executive officers, rather than focusing only on the new or extended arrangements. The list of features considered problematic has been refined. Recent amendments that incorporate problematic features will tend to carry more weight in the overall analysis. However, close scrutiny will also be given if multiple legacy problematic features are present.

Issues affecting votes on Director Nominees in Uncontested elections

current iss policy provides for the recommendation of a negative vote for directors, whether individually or as part of a committee or the entire board, due to material failures of risk oversight at the company. The 2013 Updates expand the examples of a failure of “risk oversight” to include, among other things, the hedging of company stock and the significant pledging of company stock as collateral for a loan.

These practices are seen as severing the alignment of interests between the officers and directors and the shareholders. Hedging of company stock at any level and in any form poses enough of a problem to warrant a negative vote recommendation. For companies in which officers or directors have pledged company stock as collateral, ISS considers the following factors in determining vote recommendations for the election of directors:

- Presence in the company’s proxy statement of an anti-pledging policy that prohibits future pledging activity;
- Magnitude of aggregate pledged shares in terms of total common shares outstanding or market value or trading volume;
- Disclosure of progress or lack thereof in reducing the magnitude of aggregate pledged shares over time;
- Disclosure in the proxy statement that shares subject to stock ownership and holding requirements do not include pledged company stock; and
- Any other relevant factors.

Majority Supported Shareholder Proposals

As the expectations of institutional investors, and the responsiveness of issuers, regarding majority supported shareholder proposals continue to advance, ISS has adjusted its policies accordingly. Beginning with board elections in 2014, ISS will recommend a negative vote on individual directors, committee members or the entire board, as appropriate, when the board has failed to take sufficient action on a shareholder proposal that received the support of a majority of the shares cast on such proposal in the previous year.

The 2013 Updates allow for greater flexibility in recommending a vote against only certain board members, rather than the full board. The 2013 Updates also provide more guidance for evaluating the sufficiency of a company’s response to a majority supported shareholder proposal. Responses that involve less than full implementation of the proposal will be evaluated on a case-by-case basis, considering the following the factors:

- The subject matter of the proposal;
- The level of support and opposition provided to the resolution in past meetings;
- Disclosed outreach efforts by the board to shareholders in the wake of the vote;
- Actions taken by the board in response to its engagement with shareholders;
- The continuation of the underlying issue as a voting item on the ballot (as either shareholder or management proposals); and
- Other factors as appropriate.

The revised FAQs to be issued by ISS in December may provide more guidance with respect to the implementation evaluation.

Overboarded Directors

Current ISS policy recommends a negative vote on directors who are CEOs of other public companies and sit on board of more than two public companies besides their own – with the withhold recommendation only covering their outside boards. The 2013 Updates eliminate the previous exception that counted the boards of a public company parent and its public company subsidiary as a single board so long

As the parent owned at least 20% of the subsidiary. The 2013 Updates now count these parent and subsidiary boards as two separate boards.

Shareholder Proposals Addressing Social and Environmental Issues

Environmental, Social, and Governance Compensation-Related Proposals

The 2013 Updates modify ISS policy from generally recommending a vote against to making a vote recommendation on a case-by-case basis with respect to proposals that link executive compensation to sustainability criteria, including various environmental and social criteria. As these non-financial performance metrics become more common among certain industries, specifically the extractive industry sectors, and are increasingly addressed in international investor initiatives, the 2013 Updates recognize the increasing interest of institutional investors in sustainability issues as part of the evaluation process.

Lobbying

The 2013 Updates provide for vote recommendations on a case-by-case basis when evaluating proposals requesting information on a company's lobbying activities. The 2013 Updates clarify the scope and focus of lobbying activities covered, adding indirect lobbying activities as well as lobbying procedures and principles to the list that previously included only direct lobbying and grassroots lobbying within the specific policy.

New corporate legislation comes into effect in the Netherlands on 1 October 2012 and 1 January 2013.

It is important to be aware of this as it concerns, amongst other things, Corporate Governance issues.

The new management and supervision act (including the one tier board)

As of 1 January 2013 there will be a new Corporate Governance and supervision act. It affects public companies ("NVs") and private companies with limited liability ("BVs"); some clauses are also applicable to foundations.

The most important changes are:

- One tier board versus two tier board: in addition to the two tier board, the one tier board is now established. Until today, only a two tier board, with the management board and the supervisory board as a separate body, was laid down in Dutch law. This new law brings the possibility, with certain limitations, to create a board with executive management board members and non executive (supervisory) management board members, both with their own duties. We are coming closer to the US and the UK. The one tier board differs from the two tier board in that the non-executive members in a one-tier board system are part of the management board and are therefore subject to director's liability.

- Conflict of Interest: the members of the management board and the supervisory board who have an (in) direct conflict of interest can no longer be part of the decision-making process regarding the underlying specific subject.
- Composition: for so called large entities there are new rules relating to the composition of the management and supervisory board. The number of permitted positions is limited. Furthermore, in large nvs and Bvs (and structure regimes) at least 30% of the positions on the management board and supervisory board must be held by women and at least 30% by men. This is done to stimulate the appointment of women on the company boards. It is, initially, a temporary rule (up to 1 January 2016).
- Responsibility: on the basis of the new legislation reference can be made to allocation of tasks in the articles of association. Although under Dutch law a division of tasks does not prejudice the joint responsibility of all members of the management board, it might under circumstances help by the so called individual exculpation possibility.
- Employment: management board members of listed companies will no longer be protected against dismissals or in case of illness, as the relationship between a board member and a listed company can no longer be based upon an employment agreement (but only on a management (service) agreement).

There are transitional provisions, but some clauses will apply immediately.

A Dutch BV is much more flexible as per 1 October 2012

On 1 October 2012 the Flex BV act entered into force. This Flex BV act brings major changes for BVs.

Some corporate provisions have changed while other have been deleted.

Amongst other things, amendments relate to the introduction of non-voting shares, capital requirements, the appointment of directors and supervisory board members, distributions, capital reduction, repurchase, vacancy of managing directors, financial assistance and convening general meetings.

The new legislation applies to all Bv's as of 1 october 2012.

Conclusion

Please review the current articles and decision making arrangements of your Dutch BV/NV in light of the possible consequences, and consider bringing the articles of association in line with new (coming) dutch law.

8.3 CORPORATE GOVERNANCE IN FAMILY BUSINESS

Introduction

The dominant form of business around the world is the family-owned business. In many instances, the family-owned business takes the form of a small family business whilst in other cases, it is a large business interest employing hundreds, or even thousands, of staff. The family-owned business can encompass sole traders, partnerships, private companies, and public companies. In fact, family ownership is prevalent not only amongst privately held firms but also in publicly traded firms in many countries across the globe. However, whatever the size of the business, it can benefit from having a good governance structure. Firms with effective governance structures will tend to have a more focused view of the business, be willing to take into account, and benefit from, the views of 'outsiders' (that is, non-family members), and be in a better position to evolve and grow into the future.

Ownership structures around the world

La Porta et al. (1999) analysed the ownership structure in a number of countries and found that the family-owned firm is quite common. Analysing a sample of large firms in 27 countries, La Porta et al. used as one of their criteria, a 10 per cent chain definition of control. This means that they analysed the shareholdings to see if there were 'chains' of ownership: for example, if company B held shares in company C, who then held company B's shares. On this 10 per cent chain definition of control, only 24 per cent of the large companies are widely held, compared to 35 per cent that are family-controlled, and 20 per cent state-controlled. Overall, they show that:

(1) Controlling shareholders often have control rights in excess of their cash flow rights. (2) This is true of families, who are so often the controlling shareholders. (3) Controlling families participate in the management of the firms they own. (4) Banks do not exercise much control over firms as shareholders... (5) Other large shareholders are usually not there to monitor the controlling shareholders. Family control of firms appears to be common, significant, and typically unchallenged by other equity holders.

La Porta et al.'s paper made an important contribution to our understanding of the prevalence of family-owned/controlled firms in many countries across the world.

A key influence on the type of ownership and control structure is the legal system. Traditionally, common law legal systems, such as in the UK and USA, have better protection of minority shareholders' rights than do civil law systems, such as those of France, Germany, and Russia. Often, if the legal environment does not have good protection of shareholders' rights, then this discourages a diverse shareholder base whilst being more conducive to family-owned firms where a relatively small group of individuals can retain ownership, power, and control. For example, in the UK and USA, where the rights of minority shareholders are well protected by the legal system, there are many more companies with diversified shareholder bases and family-controlled businesses are much less common.

However, research by Franks et al. (2004 and 2005) highlighted that, in the UK in the first half of the twentieth century, there was an absence of minority investor protection as we know it today, and yet there still occurred a move from family ownership to a more dispersed share ownership. This was attributable to the issuance of shares through acquisitions and mergers, although families tried to retain control of the board by holding a majority of the seats. Franks et al. (2004) state, the rise of hostile takeovers and institutional shareholders made it increasingly difficult for families to maintain control without challenge. Potential targets attempted to protect themselves through dual class shares and strategic share blocks but these were dismantled in response to opposition by institutional shareholders and the London Stock Exchange. The result was a regulated market in corporate control and a capital market that looked very different from its European counterparts. Thus, while acquisitions facilitated the growth of family controlled firms in the first half of the century, they also diluted their ownership and ultimately their control in the second half.

On the other hand, in many countries, including European countries such as France, many Asian countries, and South American countries, the legal protection of minority shareholders is today still either non-existent or ineffective, and so families often retain control in companies because non-family investors will not find the businesses an attractive investment when their rights are not protected.

However, many countries are recognizing that, as the business grows and needs external finance to pursue its expansion, then non-family investors will only be attracted to the business if there is protection of their rights, both in the context of the country's legal framework and also in the corporate governance of the individual companies in which they invest. This is leading to increasing pressure both for legal reforms to protect shareholders' rights and for corporate governance reforms within the individual companies. On the other hand, balanced against the pressures for reform are the, often very powerful, voices of family shareholders with controlling interests who may not wish to see reform to give better protection to minority interests because this would effectively dilute their control.

Family-owned firms and governance

Whilst a family-owned business is relatively small, the family members themselves will be able to manage and direct it. One advantage of a family-owned firm is that there should be less chance of the type of agency problems discussed in Chapter 2. This is because ownership and control rather than being split are still one and the same, and so the problems of information asymmetry and opportunistic behaviour should (in theory, at least) be lessened. As a result of this overlap of ownership and control, one would hope for higher levels of trust and hence less monitoring of management activity should be necessary. However, problems may still occur and especially in terms of potential for minority shareholder oppression, which may be more acute in family-owned firms. Morck and Yeung (2003) point out some of the potential agency costs in family-owned firms:

In family business group firms, the concern is that managers may act for the controlling family, but not for shareholders in general. These agency issues are: the use of pyramidal groups to separate ownership from control, the entrenchment of controlling families, and non-arm's-length transactions (aka 'tunneling') between related companies that are detrimental to public investors.

In some countries, remedies such as formal shareholder agreements, in which the nature of each shareholder's participation in the company is recorded, may be utilized as a mechanism to help resolve the potential oppression of minorities. Furthermore, the EU Commission's proposed Shareholder Rights Directive, issued in January 2006, is designed to help strengthen the role of shareholders by ensuring that they have relevant information in a timely manner and are able to vote in an informed way. Although the proposed directive is aimed at listed companies, and so likely primarily to affect institutional investors, Member States are free to extend to non-listed companies some or all of the provisions of the proposed Directive.

Another advantage of family-owned firms may be their ability to be less driven by the short-term demands of the market. Of course, they still ultimately need to be able to make a profit but they may have more flexibility as to when and how they do so.

However, even when a family business is still relatively small, there may be tensions and divisions within the family as different members may wish to take different courses of action that will affect the day-to-day way the business operates and its longer term development. In the same way as different generations of a family will have diverse views on various aspects of life, so they will in the business context as well. Similarly, as siblings may argue about various things, so they will most probably differ in their views of who should hold power within the business and how the business should develop. Even in the early stages of a family firm, it is wise to have some sort of forum where the views of family members regarding the business and its development can be expressed. One such mechanism is the family meeting or assembly, where family members can meet, often on a formal pre-arranged basis, to express their views. As time goes by and the family expands with family by marriage and new generations, then the establishment of a family council may be advisable. Neubauer and Lank (1998) suggest that a family council may be advisable once there are more than 30-40 family members.

When a business is at the stage where family relationships are impeding its efficient operation and development, or even if family members just realize that they are no longer managing the business as effectively as they might, then it is definitely time to develop a more formal governance structure. There may be an intermediate stage where the family are advised by an advisory board, although this would not provide the same benefits to the family firm as a defined board structure with independent non-executive directors. Figure 5.1 illustrates the possible stages in a family firm's governance development.

Cadbury (2000) states that establishing a board of directors in a family firm is a means of progressing from an organisation based on family relationships to one that is based primarily on business relationships. The structure of a family firm in its formative years is likely to be informal and to owe more to past history than to present needs. Once the firm has moved beyond the stage where authority is vested in the founders, it becomes necessary to clarify responsibilities and the process for taking decisions.

The advantages of a formal governance structure are several. First of all, there is a defined structure with defined channels for decision-making and clear lines of responsibility. Secondly, the board can tackle areas that may be sensitive from a family viewpoint but which nonetheless need to be dealt with - succession planning is a case in point (deciding who would be best to fill key roles in the business should the existing incumbents move on, retire, or die). Succession planning is important too in the context of raising external equity because, once a family business starts to seek external equity investment, then shareholders will usually want to know that succession planning is in place. The third advantage of a formal governance structure is also one in which external shareholders would take a keen interest: the appointment of non-executive directors. It may be that the family firm, depending on its size, appoints just one, or maybe two, non-executive directors. The key point about the non-executive director appointments is that the persons appointed should be independent; it is this trait that will make their contribution to the family firm a significant one. Of course, the independent non-executive directors should be appointed on the basis of the knowledge and experience that they can bring to the family firm: their business experience, or a particular knowledge or functional specialism of relevance to the firm, which will enable them to 'add value' and contribute to the strategic development of the family firm.

Possible stages in a family firm's governance

Cadbury (2000) sums up the three requisites for family firms to manage successfully the impacts of growth: 'They need to be able to recruit and retain the very best people for the business, they need to be able to develop a culture of trust and transparency, and they need to define logical and efficient organisational structures'. A good governance system will help family firms to achieve these requisites.

Bammens and Voordeckers (2009), in a study of family firms in Belgium, find that 'contrary to traditional agency wisdom, family firm boards devote substantial attention to controlling the management team... those family firms that employ trust and control in a complementary manner will be most effective'.

In the context of succession planning, Bennedsen et al (2006), in a study of family firms in Denmark, report that their empirical results demonstrate that professional, non-family CEOs provide extremely valuable services to the organizations they head. On the other hand, they report that family CEO underperformance is particularly large in fast-growing industries, industries with a highly skilled labor force and relatively large firms.

Smaller quoted companies

In the UK, many firms with family control will be smaller quoted companies, either on the main market or on the UK's Alternative Investment Market (AIM), which can be seen as a way for smaller firms to obtain market recognition and access to external sources of finance, often before moving on to the main market.

The Combined Code 2008 forms part of the UK Listing Authority's Rules and is applicable to all UK listed companies. This means that there should be no distinction between the governance standards expected of larger and smaller companies. The Combined Code states that it encourages smaller companies to adopt the Code's approach. However, in relation to smaller companies (those outside the FTSE 350), it states that they should have at least two independent non-executive directors (rather than half the board being independent non-executive directors, which is the requirement for larger companies); and also for listed companies outside the FTSE 350, it allows the company chairman to sit on the audit committee where he or she was considered independent on appointment.

The Quoted Companies Alliance (QCA), formerly the City Group for Smaller Companies (CISCO), is an association representing the interests of smaller companies and their advisers. The QCA fully embraces the principles of corporate governance contained in the Combined Code and advocates that these principles should be adopted by all public quoted companies in so far as it is practicable for their size. QCA Guidance for Smaller Companies (2001), updated in 2004, urges smaller companies to comply with the Combined Code as far as they are able, but where they are unable to comply fully, then they should explain why they are unable to comply. The QCA Corporate Governance Committee (2005, updated in 2007) published a corporate governance guide for AIM companies to help smaller companies seeking to develop their governance, or to meet the expectations of institutional investors.

There has been a distinct lack of research into aspects of corporate governance in small companies, with a few exceptions being Collier (1997) on audit committees in smaller listed companies, and Mallin and Ow-Yong (1998a, 1998b) on corporate governance in AIM companies and corporate governance in small companies on the main market. Mallin and Ow-Yong (2008) carried out a further study of corporate governance in AIM companies and highlighted a concern that 'with the rapid expansion of AIM and the increasing number of overseas companies, from countries whose culture of good governance may be weaker than that of the UK, a damaging financial scandal or collapse is only a matter of time'. They recommended that the role of the NOMAD [nominated advisor] be re-examined; the admission of overseas companies to AIM should be more closely scrutinized; small boards which may not be able to institute all the features of 'good' corporate governance should consider increasing the number of directors on their board, subject to resource constraints; and the regulatory authorities should monitor more closely the governance of AIM companies which have yet to start trading.

Another strand of the literature concentrates on firm-level characteristics that may serve to differentiate large and small firms. Larger firms tend to be more complex, whereas smaller firms adopt simpler systems and structures; smaller firms tend to have more concentrated leadership, whilst in a larger firm control may be more diffuse, or more subject to question by a larger board (Fama and Jensen 1983; Begley and Boyd 1987). In terms of the impact on corporate governance structures, it can be expected that in general, small and medium-sized firms will have simpler corporate governance structures than large firms - this may include: combining various of the key committees (audit, remuneration, nomination); a smaller number of non-executive directors (NEDs); a combined chair/CEO; longer contractual terms for directors due to the more difficult labour market for director appointments into small and medium-sized companies.

The role and importance of NEDs was emphasized in the Cadbury Report (1992) and in the Code of Best Practice it is stated that NEDs 'should bring an independent judgement to bear on issues of strategy, performance, resources, including key appointments, and standards of conduct'. Similarly, the Hampel Report (1998) stated: 'Some smaller companies have claimed that they cannot find a sufficient number of independent non-executive directors of suitable calibre. This is a real difficulty, but the need for a robust independent voice on the board is as strong in smaller companies as in large ones'. The importance of the NED selection process is also emphasized: they 'should be selected through a formal process and both this process and their appointment should be a matter for the board as a whole'.

From the above diagram, it can be seen that the areas where potential difficulties are most likely to arise tend to be those relating to the appointment of directors, particularly non-executive directors, which has implications for board structure. These differences arise partly because of the difficulties of attracting and retaining suitable non-executive directors in small companies.

Mallin and Ow-Yong (1998b) found that the most important attribute for small businesses when recruiting non-executive directors was their business skills and experience. Overall, the inference could be made that the ability to 'add value' to the business is the most important factor influencing NED appointments, which is in line with a study by Collier (1997). Similarly, the Hampel Committee (1998) stated 'particularly in smaller companies, non-executive directors may contribute valuable expertise not otherwise available to management'.

Areas of the Combined Code that may prove difficult for smaller companies

Combined Code recommendations	Potential difficulty
Minimum two independent NEDs	Recruiting and remunerating independent NEDs
Split roles of chair/CEO	May not be enough directors to split the roles
Audit committee comprised of two NEDs	Audit committee may include executive directors
NEDs should be appointed for specific terms	NEDs often appointed for term

However, many small companies do not have a nomination committee, and therefore non-executive director appointments are often made by the whole board. Interestingly, Mallin and Ow-Yong (2008) found that the factor that was considered to be most influential when making non-executive director appointments was considered to be 'objectivity and integrity' followed by 'relevant business skills and experience'. This perhaps highlights the impact of various corporate scandals and collapses in bringing to the fore the importance of these characteristics of objectivity and integrity.

In terms of the adoption of board committees, such as audit, remuneration, and nomination committees, small companies tend to have adopted audit and remuneration committees fairly widely but not nomination committees. In some smaller companies, the committees may carry out combined roles where, for example, the remuneration and nomination committees are combined into one committee; often the board as a whole will carry out the function of the nomination committee rather than trying to establish a separate committee from a small pool of non-executive directors.

A word of caution should be sounded though in relation to quoted companies where there is still a large block of family ownership (or indeed any other form of controlling shareholder). Charkham and Simpson (1999) point out:

the controlling shareholders' role as guardians is potentially compromised by their interest as managers. Caution is needed. The boards may be superb and they may therefore be fortunate enough to participate in a wonderful success, but such businesses can decline at an alarming rate so that the option of escape through what is frequently an illiquid market anyway may be unattractive.

The points made are twofold: first, that despite a good governance structure on paper, in practice, controlling shareholders may effectively be able to disenfranchise the minority shareholders; secondly, that in a family-owned business, or other business with a controlling shareholder, the option to sell one's shares may not be either attractive or viable at a given point in time.

Conclusions

In many countries, family-owned firms are prevalent. Corporate governance is of relevance to family-owned firms, which can encompass a number of business forms including private and publicly quoted companies, for a number of reasons. Corporate governance structures can help the company to develop successfully - they can provide the means for defined lines of decision-making and accountability, enable the family firm to benefit from the contribution of independent non-executive directors, and help to ensure a more transparent and fair approach to the way the business is organized and managed. Family-owned firms may face difficulties in initially finding appropriate independent non-executive directors but the benefits that such directors can bring is worth the time and financial investment that the family-owned firm will need to make.

SUMMARY

- Family ownership of firms is the prevalent form of ownership in many countries around the globe.
- The legal system of a country tends to influence the type of ownership that develops, so that in common law countries with good protection for minority shareholders' rights, the shareholder base is more diverse, whereas in civil law countries with poor protection for minority shareholders' rights, there tends to be more family ownership and control.
- The governance structure of a family firm may develop in various stages such as starting with a family assembly, then a family council, advisory board, and finally, a defined board structure with independent non-executive directors.
- The advantages to the family firm of a sound governance structure are that it can provide a mechanism for defined lines of decision-making and accountability, enable the family firm to benefit from the contribution of independent non-executive directors, and help to ensure a more transparent and fair approach to the way the business is organized and managed.

Example: Cadbury plc; UK

This is an example of a family firm that grew over time, developed an appropriate governance and became an international business.

Today, Cadbury is a household name in homes across the world. It was founded in the first part of the nineteenth century when John Cadbury decided to establish a business based on the manufacture and marketing of cocoa. His two sons joined the firm in 1861 and, over the years, more family members joined, and subsequently the firm became a private limited liability company, Cadbury Brothers Ltd. A board of directors was formed comprising of members of the family.

Non-family directors were first appointed to the firm in 1943, and in 1962, the firm became a publicly quoted company with the family members still being the majority on the board and holding a controlling interest (50 per cent plus) in the shares. Cadbury merged with Schweppes in the late 1960s, and over the next 40 years, Cadbury Schweppes developed a diverse shareholder base and a board of directors appointed from the wider business community. The direct family involvement, via either large shareholdings or board membership, therefore declined over the years. In the Spring of 2007, Cadbury Schweppes revealed plans to split its business into two separate entities: one focusing on its main chocolate and confectionery market; the other on its US drinks business. The demerger took effect in May 2008 so that Cadbury Schweppes plc became Cadbury plc (focusing on the former market) and Dr Pepper Snapple Group Inc: (focusing on the QS drinks business).

In 2009, Kraft launched a hostile takeover bid for Cadbury. Cadbury decided to fight to retain its independence.

Example: Hutchison Whampoa, Hong Kong

This is an example of an international company where there is controlling ownership by a family via a pyramid shareholding.

Hutchison Whampoa is a multinational conglomerate with five core businesses including ports and related services, property and hotels, telecommunications, retail and manufacturing, energy and infrastructure. It ranks as one of the Most valuable companies in Hong Kong and a large proportion of it is controlled by Cheung Kong Holdings in which the Li Ka Shing family have a significant interest which means that the Li Ka Shing family has significant influence over both companies, one through direct ownership, the other via an indirect, or pyramid, shareholding.

Hutchison Whampoa has, for many years, been the recipient of various awards and accolades. In 2005, it was voted the best-managed company in Hong Kong in a poll of institutional investors and equity analysts carried out for the Finance Asia annual awards. In the same poll, it was voted Asia's Best Conglomerate and its CFO received the Best CFO Award in Hong Kong. The Hong Kong Institute of Certified Public Accountants awarded its significant improvement Award in the Hang Seng Index Category to Hutchison Whampoa in 2005 for its 'very clear and positive approach to upgrading its corporate governance practice'. Whilst having a controlling family interest, Hutchison Whampoa is committed to good corporate governance and to its wider shareholder base. More recently, in 2008, it was recognized by Corporate Governance Asia as one of 'The Best of Asia', that is one of Asia's Best Companies for Corporate Governance.

Mini case study: Fiat, Italy

This is a good example of a firm where the founding family still have significant influence through a complex shareholding structure.

Fabbrica Italiana Automobile Torino, better known as Fiat, was founded in 1899 by a group of investors including Giovanni Agnelli. Fiat automobiles were immediately popular not just in Italy but internationally too. Fiat expanded rapidly in the 1950s and, in 1966, the founder's grandson, also Giovanni Agnelli, became the company's chairman. As well as cars, Fiat's business empire included commercial vehicles, agricultural, and construction equipment, insurance, aviation, the press, electric power and natural gas distribution. In past years, it has achieved enormous financial success.

More than 90 per cent of Italian registered companies are family owned, with many companies being run by Italian families who wield great power. Traditionally, control has been achieved, often with the minimum of capital outlay, through a complex structure involving a series of holding companies. In the case of Fiat, control by the Agnelli family is via pyramids (indirect holdings) and voting trusts particularly Ifi (a financial holding company) in which the Agnelli family have control of all the votes.

By 2002, Fiat had significant financial problems with losses of US$1.2 billion in 2002. General Motors, which had acquired a 20 per cent shareholding in Fiat at a cost of US$2.4 billion, was asked to invest further in Fiat but was reluctant to do so. In 2003, the group restructured its core business area by again focusing manufacturing and service activities on the traditional motor vehicle sector.

In 2003, Umberto Agnelli died, and in 2004, Luca Cordero di Montezemolo was nominated as Chairman. Also in 2004, Sergio Marchionne was appointed as Chief Executive of Fiat and this marked a turning point in the company's fortunes. An astute and experienced businessman, Mr Marchionne oversaw changes to various areas of the Fiat business. At the beginning of 2005, Fiat announced the creation of Fiat Powertrain Technologies, a new industrial unit designed to integrate the groups' innovation capabilities and expertise in engines and transmissions. In February 2005, the boards of directors of Fiat and General Motors met to approve the contract to terminate the master agreement and related joint ventures between the two companies. The Chairman of Fiat, Luca Cordero di Montezemolo, said:

We are delighted to have been able to conclude this agreement with General Motors. While highly beneficial to both Fiat and GM since 2000, the arrangements had become too confining for the development of Fiat Auto in today's market environment. We now have all the necessary freedom to develop strategic growth alternatives for Fiat Auto, while retaining a base on which to build a much more construction relationship with GM in the future.

There were also important changes to Fiat's corporate governance structure in June 2005, with Fiat extending its board of directors to 15 members, so that the board comprised a majority of independent non-executive directors. At the same time, Fiat strengthened its independence requirements for directors. In its press release, it stated:

After a thorough review of current international practice on this issue, the Company has adopted a set of criteria which are designed to ensure that the independence qualification is held to the highest possible standard. As an example, directors who have served on the Board for more than nine years, even though not consecutively, are deemed not to be independent. Furthermore, board members who are executive directors of other companies on whose board[s] sit executive board members of Fiat are also deemed not to be independent.

In January 2006, Fiat announced another significant strategic change with the signing of an agreement to co-operate on dealer networks with Tata Motors Ltd., which meant that Fiat cars could be distributed via the Tata network in India. Late in January 2006, Fiat announced that it had seen its first positive quarterly trading profit after 17 successive quarters of losses.

With the revision of Italian corporate governance provisions, the Fiat Group adopted and abides by the Corporate Governance Code of Italian Listed Companies issued in March 2006. Fiat provides information regarding how it meets the individual principles and criteria of the Corporate Governance code by providing a reprise of the individual principles and criteria, and then summarizing how each of these is implemented at Fiat.

2006 saw the strengthening of Fiat's presence in Europe and the gain of access into markets including China, India, and Russia. In 2007, Sergio Marchionne announced the 2007-2010 plan geared towards growth. In 2009 he unveiled his plan to put Fiat at the heart of the car-making industry globally by forging an alliance with the giant troubled US car manufacturers Chrysler and General Motors (Opel, the European arm) in June 2009, Fiat and Chrysler announced that they had finalised a global strategic partnership to begin immediately. The ultimate success of the alliance will depend on many factors and will likely have implications for the workforces in the various countries affected including Germany and the UK.

8.4 Corporate Governance in state-owned business- the MOU system Introduction

Most of the industrialization in developing countries was initiated by governments due to the inherent problems associated with the mobilization of capital for the purpose of industrialization. Also, the pursuit of economic systems and ideologies such as socialism or communism required such countries either to wholly depend on or at least sustain with the initiatives of the public sector. While many countries initiated steps to gradually do away with the whole concept of the public sector except in strategically important areas such as defence or space research like the US or UK, the Government of India has been following a policy where the public sector co-exists with the private sector even though a great deal of effort has been taken at privatization of government-owned enterprises or part divestment of government stakes in the public sector companies. Corporate governance has become applicable to many of the public sector enterprises (PSEs) as they have chosen to raise funds from the capital markets, either through public offers of equity capital or through a process of divestment of equity in favour of private corporate bodies or institutional investors.

Difficulties Encountered in Governance

While routine governance regulations become applicable for public sector companies formed under the Companies Act, 1956 and come under the purview of SEBI regulations the moment they mobilize funds from the public, the typical organizational structure of PSUs makes it difficult for the implementation of corporate governance practices as applicable to other publicly-listed private enterprises. The typical difficulties faced are:

- The board of directors will comprise essentially of bureaucrats drawn from various ministries which are interested in the PSU. In addition, there may be nominee directors from banks or financial institutions who have loan or equity exposures to the unit. The effect will be to have a board much beyond the required size, rendering decision-making a difficult process.
- The chief executive or managing director (or chairman and managing director) and other functional directors are likely to be bureaucrats and not necessarily professionals with the required expertise. This can affect the efficient running of the enterprise.

- Difficult to attract expert professionals as independent directors. The laws and regulations may necessitate a percentage of independent component on the board; but many professionals may not be enthused as there are serious limitations on the impact they can make.
- Due to their very nature, there are difficulties in implementing better governance practices. Many public sector corporations are managed and governed according to the whims and fancies of politicians and bureaucrats. Many of them view PSUs as a means to their ends. A lot of them have turned sick due to overdoses of political interference, even when their areas of operations offered enormous opportunities for advancement and growth. And when the economy was opened up, many of them lacked the competitiveness to fight it out with their counterparts from the private sector.

OECD Guidelines for Corporate Governance of State-owned Enterprises

Many of the developing countries still continue to have a dominant presence of state-owned enterprises. Hence, OECD thought it appropriate to evolve a set of governance guidelines for the state-owned enterprises as it did for the private enterprises in member countries. According to OECD, A major challenge is to find a balance between the state's responsibility for actively exercising its ownership functions, such as, the nomination and election of the board, while at the same time refraining from imposing undue political interference in the management of the company. Another important challenge is to ensure that there is a level playing field in markets where private sector companies can compete with the state-owned enterprises, and that governments do not distort competition in the way they use their regulatory or supervisory powers.'

According to OECD, the guidelines 'suggest that the state should exercise its ownership functions through a centralized ownership entity, or effectively co-ordinated entities, which should act independently and in accordance with a publicly disclosed ownership policy. The guidelines also suggest the strict separation of the state's ownership and regulatory functions. If properly implemented, these and other recommended reforms would go a long way to ensure that state ownership is exercised in a professional and accountable manner, and that the state plays a positive role in improving corporate governance across all sectors of our economies. The result would be healthier, more competitive, and transparent enterprises'.

The major recommendations in OECD guidelines are as discussed below.

Ensuring an effective legal and regulatory framework for state-owned enterprises

- There should be a clear separation between the state's ownership function and other state functions that may influence the conditions for state-owned enterprises, particularly with regard to market regulation.
- SOEs should not be exempt from the application of general laws and regulations. Stakeholders including competitors, should have access to efficient redress and an even-handed ruling when they believe that their rights have been violated.
- SOEs should face competitive conditions regarding access to finance. Their relations with state-owned banks, state-owned financial institutions, and other state-owned companies, should be based on purely commercial grounds.

State acting as an owner

The state should act as an informed and active owner, and establish a clear and consistent ownership policy, ensuring that governance of state-owned enterprises is carried out in a transparent and accountable manner with the necessary degree of professionalism and effectiveness.

- The government should develop and issue an ownership policy that defines the overall objectives of state ownership, the state's role in corporate governance of SOEs, and how it will implement its ownership policy.

- The government should not be involved in the day-to-day management of SOEs and allow them full operational autonomy to achieve their defined objectives.
- The state should let SOE boards exercise their responsibilities and respect their independence.
- The state should exercise its ownership rights according to the legal structure of each company. Keeping this in mind, it should ensure that remuneration schemes for SOE board members foster the long-term interest of the company, and can attract and motivate qualified professionals.

Equitable treatment of shareholders

The SOEs should recognize the rights of all shareholders and in accordance with the OECD principles of corporate governance, ensure their equitable treatment and equal access to corporate information.

- SOEs should observe a high degree of transparency towards all shareholders.
- The co-ordinating or ownership entity and SOEs should ensure that all shareholders are treated equally.
- The participation of minority shareholders in shareholder meetings should be facilitated in order to allow them to take part in fundamental corporate decisions, such as board election.

Relations with stakeholders

The state ownership policy should fully recognize the state-owned enterprises' responsibilities towards stakeholders and report their relations with them.

- Listed on large SOEs, as well as SOEs pursuing important public policy objectives, should report on stakeholder relations.

Transparency and disclosure

State-owned enterprises should observe high standards of transparency in accordance with the OECD Principles of Corporate Governance.

- SOEs should develop efficient internal audit procedures and establish an internal audit function that is monitored by and reports directly to the board and to the audit committee or the equivalent company organ.
- SOEs, especially large ones, should be subject to an annual independent external audit based on international standards. The existence of specific state control procedures does not substitute for an independent external audit.

Responsibilities of the boards of state-owned enterprises

The boards of state-owned enterprises should have the necessary authority, competencies, and objectivity to carry out their function of strategic guidance and monitoring of management. They should act with integrity and be held accountable for their actions.

- The boards of SOEs should be assigned a clear mandate and ultimate responsibility for the company's performance. The board should be fully accountable to the owners, act in the best interest of the company, and treat all shareholders equally.
- SOE boards should carry out their functions of monitoring of management and strategic guidance, subject to the objectives set by the government and the ownership entity. They should have the power to appoint and remove the CEO.
- The boards of SOEs should be so composed that they can exercise objective and independent judgement. Good practice calls for the chair to be separate from the CEO.

- SOE boards should carry out an annual evaluation to appraise their performance.

Conflicts of Interest

Conflicts of interest are a major challenge to the establishment and maintenance of good governance practices, and can occur and exist irrespective of the ownership structures. While some of the conflicts may be similar in nature, others may be typical to the type of ownership structure.

Most of the conflicts of interest in PSUs occur because of the roles played by bureaucrats and politicians in the running and management of the enterprise. For example, politicians or bureaucrats may try to have their candidate as the chairman and/or managing director in order to push through their private agendas rather than getting the best professional to run the PSU. There have also been many instances where the chairman and/or managing director, or other senior executives of the PSU has placed orders or awarded contracts at rates higher than the best prices, and earned hefty commissions on these. Orders or contracts may also be given to those who do not have the necessary capabilities to execute them. What is best for the PSU usually gets neglected. There may also be issues such as ministers or politicians yielding to recommendations of their cadre and sometimes even creating positions or designations that are not at all needed, leading the PSU to have a bloated workforce and driving it into the sick category. Politicians or bureaucrats may even harp on the flimsy reason that PSUs have employment generation as one of their aims. Most of the conflicts of interest with regret to PSUs dwell on the area of decision-making, which is very often not founded on merit.

Public Sector Enterprises and the Memorandum Of Understanding:

After Independence, Public Sector Enterprises (CPSEs) were set up in India with an objective to promote rapid economic development through the creation and expansion of infrastructure by the government. With different phases of development, the role of CPSEs has changed and their operations have extended to a wide range of activities in manufacturing, engineering, steel, heavy machinery, machine tools, fertilizers, drugs, textiles, pharmaceuticals, petro-chemicals, extraction and refining of crude oil and services such as telecommunication, trading, tourism, warehousing, etc. as well as a range of consultancy services. While there have been many CPSEs that have performed very well in competition with private sector enterprises, there are also many CPSEs that have performed very poorly. In an economic environment that has changed considerably in the last two decades, the role of CPSEs has changed and they have been increasingly guided to reduce their dependence on the Government. They have been listed on the stock exchange and few of them have been privatized. The Government has provided CPSEs the necessary flexibility and autonomy to operate effectively in a competitive environment. However, there are a few issues with the operation and management of CPSEs which still persist and need to be attended to. There is a need to develop a mechanism on how government can get an efficient Indian presence in the sectors where the private sector investments are not forthcoming especially in strategic areas where developing capabilities is essential if India has to play its rightful role among the among the nations of the world.

Governance in India: The Path Ahead

The Indian economy on the eve of the Twelfth Plan is characterized by strong macro-fundamentals and good performance over the Eleventh Plan period, though clouded by some slowdown in growth in the current year with continuing concern about inflation and a sudden increase in uncertainty about the global economy. The objective of the Eleventh Plan was faster and inclusive growth and the initiatives taken in the Eleventh Plan period have resulted in substantial progress towards both objectives. Inevitably, there are some weaknesses that need to be addressed and new challenges that need to be faced. Some of the challenges themselves emanate from the economy's transition to a higher and more inclusive growth path, the structural changes that come with it and the expectations it generates. There are external challenges also arising from the fact that the global economic environment is much less favourable than it was at the start of the Eleventh Plan. These challenges call for renewed efforts on multiple fronts, learning from the experience gained, and keeping in mind global developments. We focus on the backdrop of target setting and areas of focus of the Eleventh Plan. India entered the Eleventh Plan period (2007-2012) with an impressive record of economic growth. The vision for the Eleventh Plan prominently included an improvement in governance. Over the years, the governments at the Centre and the States have launched a large number of initiatives at substantial public expense to achieve the objectives of growth with poverty alleviation and inclusiveness. Experience suggests that many of these initiatives have floundered because of poor design, insufficient accountability and also corruption at various levels. Increasingly, there is demand for effective implementation without which expanded government intervention will be infructuous. The strategy for the Eleventh Plan was therefore aimed at bringing about major improvements in governance which would make government-funded programmes in critical areas more effective and efficient. The best possible way of achieving this objective may be by involving communities in both the design and implementation of such programmes, although such involvement may vary from sector to sector. For achieving the vision of the Eleventh Plan, it is extremely important to experiment with programme design to give more flexibility to decision making at the local level. It is especially important to improve evaluation of the effectiveness of how government programmes work and to inject a commitment to change their designs in the light of the experience gained. Evaluation must be based on proper benchmarks and be scientifically designed to generate evidence-based assessment of different aspects of programme design. Along with greater transparency and feedback from community participation, this is particularly important in the case of programmes delivering services directly to the poor. Accountability and transparency are critical elements of good governance. The Right to Information Act (RTI) enacted in 2005 empowers people to get information and constitutes a big step towards transparency and accountability.

MoU in India

Notwithstanding the spectacular performance of CPSEs in several areas, there has been a sense of disillusionment with some aspects of CPSE performance such as low profitability and lack of competitiveness. The extensive regulation of CPSEs by government had stifled the initiative and growth of public sector. The Economic Administration Reforms Commission (Chairman: L. K. Jha) had dwelt on issue of autonomy and accountability. The Commission had recommended a careful re-consideration of extant concepts and instrumentalities relating to the accountability of public enterprises with a view to ensuring (a) that they do not erode the autonomy of public enterprises and thus hampers the very objectives and purposes for which these enterprises have been set up and given corporate shape and for which they are to be accountable; and (b) accountability has to be secured in the wider sense of answerability for the performance of tasks and achievements of results (EARC-II/Report No. 4, p. 22). The adoption of MoU system in India could be seen as an attempt to operationalize this very vital recommendation.

Memorandum of Understanding: In Retrospect

The concept of Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) has been designed to provide flexibility and autonomy to Central Public Sector Enterprises (CPSEs) such that it facilitates them in pursuing the objectives and purposes, for which the enterprises have been set up. Accountability has to be understood in a wider sense by associating it with answerability for the performance of the tasks and the achievement of targets negotiated mutually between the Government and the CPSE. The rationale for MoU could be derived from principal/agent theory. The principal (administrative ministry on behalf of real owners- the people) can only observe outcomes and cannot measure accurately the efforts expended by the agent (CPSE managers). Also the Principal can only, to a limited extent, distinguish the effects of influences from other factors, which affect the performance (Laffont and Tirole 1993). Therefore extensive intervention by administrators, who might not be too knowledgeable about the nature of problems confronting the enterprises, not only impacts productivity and profitability but also makes it impossible to fix accountability for non-achievement of targets.

A negotiated incentive contract (MoU), hence, is viewed as a device to reveal information and motivate managers to exert effort. Proponents argue that the contract can translate multiple objectives into targets which can be measured by specified criteria and could be given weights to reflect priorities. Moreover, targets can be set to take into account circumstances where CPSE managers have less control over their firms than their counterparts in the private sector. For example, performance might be judged against the firm's past trends, rather than against an industry standard, to take account of situations where the firm's performance is sub-standard because of government imposed constraints (such as prohibitions on layoffs, price controls, etc.).

By specifying targets and evaluating results ex post, the MoU is seen by its advocates as a way to encourage governments to reduce ex ante controls, giving managers more freedom and motivation to improve operating efficiency.

Hence, it is strongly felt that Performance Contracts will improve performance only if they elicit both the Government's and the Firms' commitment. Since Government is both a signatory and the enforcer of the contract, it is especially important that its commitment remains credible. Political determinants may preclude the design of incentive contracts and impede CPSEs in producing the sort of productivity gains being achieved by the private firms. These findings suggest that effort in designing a framework of MoU on consistent basis can produce good results.

The Memorandum of Understanding (MoU) System in India was introduced in the year 1986, after the recommendations of the Arjun Sengupta Committee Report (1984). Twenty six years after its inception, the MoU system has evolved and is being strengthened, through regular reviews, to become a management tool that helps in performance evaluation as well as performance enhancement of CPSEs in the country.

In the backdrop of the dynamic external environment, "world-wide competition" and globalization, it is critical that the MoU system is strengthened such that it facilitates the CPSEs in becoming economically viable through efficient management and control. Hence, the MoU system aims at offering autonomy to CPSEs and is designed such that it can aid in the assessment of the extent to which mutually agreed objectives (Mandal, 2012) are achieved. This section of the report traces the evolution of the MoU system through various committee reports and highlights the major observations, along with the actions taken thereafter. This would act as an indicator of the developments that have happened in the MoU system in India and, through the study of extant literature, would also highlight the areas of concern raised after each study.

The various committees formed over the years are:

1. Arjun Sengupta Committee Report (1984)
2. National Council of Applied Economic Research (2004)
3. Report of the Working Group (2008)

Concerns Regarding Memorandum of Understanding (MoU)

Thematic analysis has been applied, in this study, as a qualitative research method and the emergent issues/ challenges with the current MoU system have been clearly identified. Each issue is highlighted in the concrete box while sub-issues have been highlighted in dotted boxes. The Initial Thematic Web is presented in Figure below

Figure clearly brings out the several challenges which the MoU system in India, currently faces. These issues and challenges have also been highlighted by various committee reports and extant literature.

- Dark Lines Connect Broad Themes (Issues)
- Dotted lines connect Sub-Themes (Issues)

Conclusion:

It has been established through the discussion that from the year of its inception - 1986 till today (2013), the Memorandum of Understanding system in India has been consistently moving towards improvement to eventually become a management tool. The tool not only measures the performance of CPSEs on financial parameters but also on strategic, non- financial parameters. However, the existing literature, nationally as well as internationally, highlights the areas of improvement in the MoU framework and the present study group, attempts to fill the identified gaps through scientific research.

As corporate governance practices need to be understood as a significant part of the broader CPSE reform and renewal programme rather than as a separate stand-alone exercise, the study group recommends that the MoU System for CPSEs needs to inject the following good governance practices to enhance the autonomy as well as efficiency of the CPSEs:

- Professionalizing the CPSE Boards by including managers from the private sector in the CPSE Boards as independent directors;
- Rolling out leadership development programmes which would be compulsory for the Board members; and
- Increasing transparency of the CPSEs by making internal controls and audit strong, as well as carrying out supplementary audits on a timely basis.

9.1 CORPORATE SOCIAL RESPONSIBILITY: TOWARDS A SUSTAINABLE FUTURE

Background

The role of corporates by and large has been understood in terms of a commercial business paradigm of thinking that focuses purely on economic parameters of success.

As corporates have been regarded as institutions that cater to the market demand by providing products and services, and have the onus for creating wealth and jobs, their market position has traditionally been a function of financial performance and profitability.

However, over the past few years, as a consequence of rising globalisation and pressing ecological issues, the perception of the role of corporates in the broader societal context within which it operates, has been altered.

Stakeholders (employees, community, suppliers and share-holders) today are redefining the role of corporates taking into account the corporates' broader responsibility towards society and environment, beyond economic performance, and are evaluating whether they are conducting their role in an ethical and socially responsible manner.

As a result of this shift (from purely economic to 'economic with an added social dimension'), many forums, institutions and corporates are endorsing the term Corporate Social Responsibility (CSR).

They use the term to define organisation's commitment to the society and the environment within which it operates.

The World Business Council on Sustainable Development's (WBCSD) report was titled Corporate Social Responsibility: Making Good Business Sense and the OECD Guidelines for Multi-National Enterprises which includes a discussion on how CSR is emerging as a global business standard.

Further, there is a global effort towards reinforcing CSR programmes and initiatives through local and international schemes that try to identify best-in-class performers.

CSR: A Historical Perspective

The concept of CSR in India is not new, the term may be. The process though acclaimed recently, has been followed since ancient times albeit informally.

Philosophers like Kautilya from India and pre-Christian era philosophers in the West preached and promoted ethical principles while doing business. The concept of helping the poor and disadvantaged was cited in much of the ancient literature.

The idea was also supported by several religions where it has been intertwined with religious laws. “Zakaat”, followed by Muslims, is donation from one's earnings which is specifically given to the poor and disadvantaged. Similarly Hindus follow the principle of “Dhramada” and Sikhs the “Daashaant”.

In the global context, the recent history goes back to the seventeenth century when in 1790s, England witnessed the first large scale consumer boycott over the issue of slave harvested sugar which finally forced importer to have free-labor sourcing.

In India, in the pre independence era, the businesses which pioneered industrialisation along with fighting for independence also followed the idea.

They put the idea into action by setting up charitable foundations, educational and healthcare institutions, and trusts for community development.

The donations either monetary or otherwise were sporadic activities of charity or philanthropy that were taken out of personal savings which neither belonged to the shareholders nor did it constitute an integral part of business.

The term CSR itself came in to common use in the early 1970s although it was seldom abbreviated. By late 1990s, the concept was fully recognised; people and institutions across all sections of society started supporting it.

This can be corroborated by the fact that while in 1977 less than half of the Fortune 500 firms even mentioned CSR in their annual reports, by the end of 1990, approximately 90 percent Fortune 500 firms embraced CSR as an essential element in their organisational goals, and actively promoted their CSR activities in annual reports (Boli and Hartsuiker, 2001).

According to “Altered Images: the 2001 State of Corporate Responsibility in India Poll”, a survey conducted by Tata Energy Research Institute (TERI), the evolution of CSR in India has followed a chronological evolution of 4 thinking approaches:

Ethical Model(1930 –1950): One significant aspect of this model is the promotion of “trusteeship” that was revived and reinterpreted by Gandhiji. Under this notion the businesses were motivated to manage their business entity as a trust held in the interest of the community. The idea prompted many family run businesses to contribute towards socioeconomic development. The efforts of Tata group directed towards the well being of the society are also worth mentioning in this model.

Statist Model (1950 –1970s): Under the aegis of Jawahar Lal Nehru, this model came into being in the post independence era. The era was driven by a mixed and socialist kind of economy. The important feature of this model was that the state ownership and legal requirements decided the corporate responsibilities.

Liberal Model (1970s –1990s): The model was encapsulated by Milton Friedman. As per this model, corporate responsibility is confined to its economic bottom line. This implies that it is sufficient for business to obey the law and generate wealth, which through taxation and private charitable choices can be directed to social ends.

Stakeholder Model (1990s – Present): The model came into existence during 1990s as a consequence of realisation that with growing economic profits, businesses also have certain societal roles to fulfill. The model expects companies to perform according to “triple bottom line” approach. The businesses are also focusing on accountability and transparency through several mechanisms.

CSR: Definition

The totality of CSR can be best understood by three words: ‘corporate,’ ‘social,’ and ‘responsibility.’ In broad terms, CSR relates to responsibilities corporations have towards society within which they are based and operate, not denying the fact that the purview of CSR goes much beyond this. CSR is comprehended differently by different people.

Some perceive it to be a commitment of a company to manage its various roles in society, as producer, employer, customer and citizen in a responsible manner while for others it is synonymous to Corporate Responsibility (CR) or Corporate Citizenship or Social Action Programme (SAP). Of late, the term has also been started to link up with Triple Bottom Line Reporting (TBL) which essentially measures an enterprise's performance against economic, social and environmental indicators.

Discourses on CSR suggest that many definitions of CSR exist within the business community, and CSR continues to be an evolving concept, with no single definition that is universally accepted. Given below are three key definitions that have garnered wide acceptance and favour amongst business circles:

Definition # 1: Philip Kotler and Nancy Lee (2005) define CSR as "a commitment to improve community well being through discretionary business practices and contributions of corporate resources" whereas Mallen Baker refers to CSR as "a way companies manage the business processes to produce an overall positive impact on society."

Definition # 2: According to World Business Council for Sustainable Development "Corporate Social Responsibility is the continuing commitment by business to behave ethically and contribute to economic development while improving the quality of life of the workforce and their families as well as of the local community and society at large".

Definition # 3: Archie Carroll in 1991 describes CSR as a multilayered concept that can be differentiated into four interrelated aspects – economic, legal, ethical and philanthropic responsibilities.

Carroll presents these different responsibilities as consecutive layers within a pyramid, such that "true" social responsibility requires the meeting of all four levels consecutively. The model probably is the most accepted and established.

While the definitions of CSR may differ, there is an emerging consensus on some common principles that underline CSR:

CSR is a business imperative: Whether pursued as a voluntary corporate initiative or for legal compliance reasons, CSR will achieve its intended objectives only if businesses truly believe that CSR is beneficial to them.

CSR is a link to sustainable development: businesses feel that there is a need to integrate social, economic and environmental impact in their operation; and CSR is a way to manage business: CSR is not an optional add on to business, but it is about the way in which businesses are managed.

9.2 CSR: A COMMONLY MISUNDERSTOOD CONCEPT

In the absence of a universally accepted definition for CSR, there are some myths that surround the concept:

Myth # 1: Businesses invest the money, therefore they decide the modus operandi of the CSR initiative

There is a notion that since businesses invest money in society, they are the one who will be deciding upon the modus operandi of the CSR initiative. However this is not true. CSR driven by the mandate of an enterprise alone may not generate desired results. Stakeholders must be involved from the onset in defining an initiative to make it successful. Corporates must not assume that they understand the needs of a community by taking them at face value; stakeholder's needs must be considered within the local context and culture.

Myth # 2: Financial resources alone can meet CSR needs of an enterprise.

In fact, financial resources are only part of the equation. Besides financial resources, it is equally or even more important for the CSR programmes to be well defined and well accompanied by adequate human resources if they are to meet the intended objectives.

Myth # 3: CSR is interchangeable with corporate sponsorship, donation or other philanthropic activities.

The focus of responsible business practices in the profit sector is hitherto largely confined to community charity-based projects.

While this may have been relevant for the historical context in the mid-90s when Carroll's definition was coined, the current thinking of CSR has moved beyond philanthropy to in fact encompass all internal and external segments of business operations: employees, market environment and community.

CSR: Rationale

The rationale for CSR has been articulated in a number of ways. In essence, it is about building sustainable businesses, which need healthy economies, markets and communities. The major reasons for CSR can be outlined as -

Globalisation

As a consequence of cross-border trade, multinational enterprises and global supply chains, there is an increased awareness on CSR concerns related to human resource management practices, environmental protection, and health and safety, among other things. Reporting on the CSR activities by corporates is therefore increasingly becoming mandatory.

In an increasingly fast-paced global economy, CSR initiatives enable corporates to engage in more meaningful and regular stakeholder dialogue and thus be in a better position to anticipate and respond to regulatory, economic, social and environmental changes that may occur.

There is a drive to create a sustainable global economy where markets, labour and communities are able to function well together and companies have better access to capital and new markets.

Financial investors are increasingly incorporating social and environmental criteria when making decisions about where to place their money, and are looking to maximise the social impact of the investment at local or regional levels.

International Legal Instruments and Guidelines

In the recent past, certain indicators and guidelines such as the SA 8000, a social performance standard based on International Labour Organization Conventions have been developed. International agencies such as United Nations and the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development have developed compacts, declarations, guidelines, principles and other instruments that set the tone for social norms for organisations, though these are advisory for organisations and not mandatory.

One of the United Nations Millennium Development Goals calls for increased contribution of assistance from country states to help alleviate poverty and hunger, and states in turn are advising corporates to be more aware of their impact on society. In order to catalyze actions in support of the MDGs, initiatives such as Global Compact are being put in place to instrumentalise CSR across all countries.

As the world's largest, global corporate citizenship initiative by the UN, the Global Compact, a voluntary initiative is concerned with building the social legitimacy of business.

The Global Compact is a framework for businesses that are committed to aligning their business operations and strategies with ten universally accepted principles that postulate that companies should embrace, support and enact, a set of core values in the areas of human rights, labour standards, the environment, and anti-corruption.

Changing Public Expectations of Business

Globally companies are expected to do more than merely provide jobs and contribute to the economy through taxes and employment. Consumers and society in general expect more from the companies whose products they buy. This is coherent with believing the idea that whatever profit is generated is because of society, and hence mandates contributing a part of business to the less privileged.

Further, separately in the light of recent corporate scandals, which reduced public trust of corporations, and reduced public confidence in the ability of regulatory bodies and organisations to control corporate excess. This has led to an increasing expectation that companies will be more open, more accountable and be prepared to report publicly on their performance in social and environmental arenas.

Corporate Brand

In an economy where corporates strive for a unique selling proposition to differentiate themselves from their competitors, CSR initiatives enable corporates to build a stronger brand that resonates with key external stake-holders – customers, general public and the government.

Businesses are recognising that adopting an effective approach to CSR can open up new opportunities, and increasingly contribute to the corporates' ability to attract passionate and committed workforces.

Corporates in India are also realising that their reputation is intrinsically connected with how well they consider the effects of their activities on those with whom they interact. Wherever the corporates fail to involve parties, affected by their activities, it may put at risk their ability to create wealth for themselves and society.

Therefore, in terms of business, CSR is essentially a strategic approach for firms to anticipate and address issues associated with their interactions with others and, through those interactions, to succeed in their business endeavors. The idea that CSR is important to profitability and can prevent the loss of customers, shareholders, and even employees is gaining increasing acceptance.

Further, CSR can help to boost the employee morale in the organisation and create a positive brand-centric corporate culture in the organisation. By developing and implementing CSR initiatives, corporates feel contented and proud, and this pride trickles down to their employees.

The sense of fulfilling the social responsibility leaves them with a feeling of elation. Moreover it serves as a soothing diversion from the mundane workplace routine and gives one a feeling of satisfaction and a meaning to their lives.

Trends in CSR: From Charity to Responsibility

An insight into the history of CSR reveals that till 1990s it was solely dominated by the idea of philanthropy.

Considering CSR as an act of philanthropy, businesses often restricted themselves to one time financial grant and did not commit their re-sources for such projects. Moreover, businesses never kept the stakeholder in mind while planning for such initiatives, thereby reducing the efficacy and efficiency of CSR initiatives. However, over the last few years, the concept of CSR has been changing.

There has been an apparent transition from giving as an obligation or charity to giving as a strategy or responsibility. Review of the case studies and work done on CSR by companies in India suggests that the CSR is slowly moving away from charity and dependence and starting to build on empowerment and partnership.

Conceptualisation

Nowadays corporates are treating CSR as a separate entity and devote attention to it. Most of the corporates have a vision and mission statements often at the corporate level or some-times at the CSR level that drive their CSR initiative. Deliberations are made to choose specific issues and initiatives. It has been observed that the areas they choose somewhere relate to their core values.

Companies today are increasingly sensitive about their social role. The companies not only concentrate on how they will position their product or how they will sell it but also they have a social strategy because they have started feeling that brands are built not only around good quality of the product; but also around emotions and values that people ascribe to those products.

Today, CSR has been understood in terms of accountability where corporates are feeling that they are responsible for the impact their actions have on several stakeholders. They feel that the basic motive of CSR today is to increase the company's overall impact on the society and stakeholders.

Implementation

Moving away from the traditional approach, corporates rather than following top to bottom mechanism are increasingly bearing stakeholders' perspectives in mind, thereby considering CSR as a comprehensive set of policies, practices and programmes that are integrated throughout the business operations.

It can thus be deduced that radical transformation is happening with CSR practices across India. The changes happened at conceptual level where charity oriented approach is now being seen as a stakeholder oriented approach and at implementation level where other important resources except finance are being dedicated. Several innovative programmes in thematic areas of public health, education, environment, microfinance and related areas are being developed. These programmes are developed bearing in mind the local cultural context and the needs of people. Apart from devoting funds, expertise in terms of knowledge and human resource is also allocated for successful implementation of these programmes.

In a growing number of companies these processes are encouraged and rewarded by top management. The implementation of programmes through a trained resource makes a real difference in the community that has been chosen for implementation.

The following are key focus areas being incorporated into business practices:

Partnership with NGOs and Government

There has been an increase in the number of corporates partnering with NGOs and the Government to ensure successful execution of initiatives.

Community development

Most large companies either have their own foundations or contribute to other initiatives that directly support the community upliftment, notably in health, education, and agriculture.

Environmental management

Environmental policies and programmes are now standard, and many companies have implemented the ISO 14 001 system throughout their businesses.

Workplace

Growing out of a long-standing commitment to training and safety is a more recent emphasis on knowledge and employee well-being.

Evaluation

Along with innovation at conceptualisation and implementation, corporates are now undertaking greater evaluation and stricter accountability and transparency norms. Evaluating the programme essentially answers the question “what good did we do?” Evaluating programmes, based on internationally accepted formats provide feedback for correction and based on that public disclosure is done.

Reporting

A very important aspect of CSR is the reporting practices that corporates adhere to inform their key internal and external stakeholders of social responsibility practices. In the recent past, several indicators such as the Global Reporting Initiatives guidelines and sustainability reporting have been developed. Sustainability Reporting (SR) frameworks help the companies conform to the global standards of disclosures for maintaining transparency with regard to its operations and value chain and ensuring accountability towards its internal and external stakeholders.

CSR: A Quantitative Analysis

The Case Study quantitative analysis represents an objective overview of the corporate social responsibility trends in India based on the desktop research and case study analysis of the Corporates who have responded to the request by ASSOCHAM to share their CSR efforts and initiatives, for the compendium. 27 case studies were submitted in total and out of these 24 were used as a base to deduce some directional pointers on the status of CSR and some trends in India. The analysis does not intend or aim to pass a qualitative judgement on any corporate initiative or how good or bad it is, but rather focuses on presenting a broad overview of implementing the CSR practices.

It is assumed that there is an inherent bias, as the corporate that have submitted case studies are implementing the CSR in a way or other. Moreover the source of information being they (corporates) is not an unbiased source.

Thematic Areas

Action in CSR in India largely spans a diverse set of thematic areas – health, education, livelihood, poverty alleviation, environment, water, housing, energy and microfinance. However some other areas like women empowerment, child development and infrastructure also appeared in the case studies.

Based on the comparative study of the 24 companies, it was found that while some companies chose to narrow their focus on a few thematic areas, others took a broader view and undertook a larger scope of areas to focus on. Out of 24 case studies that were analysed, it was found that there were as many as 16 corporates focusing on 3-5 thematic areas,

Whereas only 4 Corporates catered to 1-2 thematic areas of work and remaining four stuck to six or more thematic areas.

In terms of the area focus environment garnered the maximum attention from Corporates while women empowerment and poverty alleviation were neglected areas with minimal corporate focusing on the same,

CSR Management

It has been observed that for 37 percent Corporates, the CSR initiative is being implemented through a well structured separated Foundation. Among 58 percent corporate there is separate CSR department that takes care of the activities to be implemented.

Partnership

The importance of building strong public – private partnerships as well as working closely with NGOs as implementation partners being increasingly realised by corporate. It has been Observed that 58 percent of the corporate within the surveyed sample partnered with the government departments. The number is higher for the engagement with NGOs where approximately 67 percent corporate have formed linkages. 21 percent corporate were working in partnership with multilateral or bilateral organisations.

Stakeholders

Stakeholder engagement has become one of the important aspects of CSR practices. Though there are different sets of stakeholders that can be taken into account while implementing CSR, we decided to obtain information on the following – employees, neighboring community and general public. Neighboring community refers to the people in catchment area of corporate who have a direct effect of business on them.

Out of total 24, five corporates work towards the benefit of employees, neighboring community and general public. There are 2 corporates that have set of employees and general public as their stakeholders.

Five and two corporates have as their stakeholders the set of general public and neighboring community and employees and neighboring community respectively.

Only one corporate has decided to concentrate on the neighboring community as the stakeholder.

Sustainability Reporting (SR) is also gaining prominence and recognition as a value added tool for displaying a corporate's commitment towards transparency and accountability towards its stakeholders.

It helps a company to report on the social, environmental and economic impact of its activities, along with a report on the internal state of its management and employee welfare system in a manner as rigorous and transparent as financial reporting.

A well drafted Sustainability report provides a balanced and reasonable representation of the sustainability performance of a reporting organisation (both positive & negative).

SR helps the organisations define and communicate their overall context and rationale to solve global problems through its specific business model or elicit whether its business model design is influenced by those problems. SR is also increasingly recognised as a tool for brand and image building.

Reporting Initiatives

Public disclosure and reporting was another metric used to Compare the CSR initiatives of corporates. It was observed that within the sample of 24 companies used, 25 percent are reporting as per the GRI guidelines while 21 percent were signatories of the UN Global Compact.

An equal number of corporates (21 percent) come up with a separate CSR report while there are only a few (8 percent) who have a mention of their CSR activities in the annual report.

Comparative numbers of reporting of CSR in the annual report at global level are much higher. For instance in 1977 the number was 50 percent, which rose to 90 percent in 1990.

The Way Forward

The World Business Council for Sustainable Development has noted that a coherent CSR strategy based on integrity, sound values and a long-term approach offers clear business benefits to companies and contributes to the well-being of society. As companies move forward to design a CSR strategy that provides the intended leverage point as intended, key success factors that need to be borne in mind are -

Corporate Social Responsibility is not charity

The originally defined concept of CSR needs to be interpreted and dimensionalised in the broader conceptual framework of how the corporate embed their corporate values as a new strategic asset, to build a basis for trust and cooperation within the wider stakeholder community.

Though there have been evidences that record a paradigm shift from charity to a long-term strategy, yet the concept still is believed to be strongly linked to philanthropy. There is a need to bring about an attitudinal change in people about the concept.

By having more coherent and ethically driven discourses on CSR, it has to be understood that CSR is about how corporates place their business ethics and behaviors to balance business growth and commercial success with a positive change in the stakeholder community.

Several corporates today have specific departments to operationalise CSR. There are either foundations or trusts or a separate department within an organisation that looks into implementation of practices.

Being treated as a separate entity, there is always a flexibility and independence to carry out the tasks.

But often these entities work in isolation without creating a synergy with the other departments of the corporate. There is a need to understand that CSR is not only a pure management directive but it is something that is central to the company and has to be embedded in the core values and principles of the corporate.

Whatever corporates do within the purview of CSR has to be related to core business. It has to utilise things at which corporates are good; it has to be something that takes advantage of the core skills and competencies of the companies. It has to be a mandate of the entire organisation and its scope does not simply begin and end with one department in the organisation.

While conceptualisation and implementation seem firmly underway, evaluation is still taking a back seat. There is a need to incorporate an evaluation plan, which along with presenting a scope of improvement in terms of fund utilisation and methodology adopted for the project, measures the short and long term impact of the practices.

While there have been success stories of short term interventions, their impact has been limited and have faded over a period of time. It is essential for corporates to adopt a long term approach rather than sticking to short term interventions, involving the companies and employees in the long-term process of positive social transition.

A clearly defined mission and a vision statement combined with a sound implementation strategy and a plan of action firmly rooted in ground realities and developed in close collaboration with implementation partners, is what it takes for a successful execution of CSR.

An area that can be looked upon is the sharing of best practices by corporates. A plausible framework for this could be bench-marking. While benchmarking will help corporates evaluate their initiatives and rank them, it will also provide an impetus to others to develop similar kind of practices. Credibility Alliance, a consortium of voluntary organisations follows a mechanism of accreditation for voluntary sector. Efforts have to be directed towards building a similar kind of mechanism for CSR as well.

Sustainable development, like building a successful business, requires taking the long-term view. The KPMG International Survey of Corporate Responsibility Reporting 2005 showed that voluntary reporting on sustainability is on the increase across all the countries. Sustainability Reporting is emerging as a key vehicle to implement CSR and measure its progress in organisations.

As we move forward, increasing numbers of companies are expected to issue Sustainability Reports, with the scope of issues broadening from purely environmental reporting to a more comprehensive coverage of the environmental, social and economic dimensions.

There is a strong corporate initiative on joining the Global Compact Society in India, as well, with 43 Indian companies having already joined Global Compact as of January 2008.

Corporate Citizenship: A new way to market CSR?

A new terminology that has been gaining grounds in the business community today is Corporate Citizenship. So what is corporate citizenship and is this fundamentally different from corporate social responsibility? Corporate citizenship is defined by the Boston College Centre for Corporate Citizenship, as the business strategy that shapes the values underpinning a company's mission and the choices made each day by its executives, managers and employees as they engage with society.

According to this definition, the four key principles that define the essence of corporate citizenship are: (i) Minimise harm (ii) Maximise benefit (iii) Be accountable and responsive to key stakeholders (iv) Support strong financial results.

Thus, corporate citizenship, similar to its CSR concept, is focusing on the membership of the corporation in the political, social and cultural community, with a focus on enhancing social capital. Notwithstanding the different terminologies and nomenclature used, the focus for companies today should be to focus on delivering to the basic essence and promise of the message that embodies these key concepts – CSR and Corporate Citizenship.

Conclusion

Corporate Social Responsibility is not a fad or a passing trend, it is a business imperative that many Indian companies are either beginning to think about or are engaging with in one way or another.

While some of these initiatives may be labeled as corporate citizenship by some organisations, there basic message and purpose is the same.

A successfully implemented CSR strategy calls for aligning these initiatives with business objectives and corporate values thereby integrating corporate responsibility across the business functions and enhancing business reputation.

The challenge for us is to apply fundamental business principles to make CSR sharper, smarter, and focused on what really matters.

This can be done by:

- Focusing on priorities
- Allocating finance for treating CSR as an investment from which returns are expected
- Optimising available resources by ensuring that efforts are not duplicated and existing services are strengthened and supplemented
- Monitoring activities and liaising closely with implementation partners such as NGOs to ensure that initiatives really deliver the desired outcomes
- Reporting performance in an open and transparent way so that all can celebrate progress and identify areas for further action.

A long term perspective by organisations, which encompasses their commitment to both internal and external stake-holders, will be critical to the success of CSR and the ability of companies to deliver on the goals of their CSR strategy.

Case Study I

Name: ACC Limited

Thematic Areas: Education, Health, Environment, Livelihood and Waste Management

Case Study:

In 2007 several CSR initiatives were taken to meet the requirements of various stakeholder groups.

Community development

We commenced a fresh round of Community Needs Assessment studies by external agencies for those living in the vicinity of all our plants across India.

An important partnership was forged with Development Alternatives, a reputed NGO, to help launch a Sustainable Community Development programme for those living near our Wadi Plant in Karnataka.

The time-bound plan spread over 3 years targets the building of local institutional and human capacities, creation of local enterprise-based livelihoods, healthier habitats with adequate community physical infrastructure, household services and village institution building.

HIV/AIDS Programme

ACC's effort to participate in the national effort against HIV/AIDS included the establishment of a treatment center at Wadi, and partnership with Christian Medical College, Vellore both of which address the challenges in the two states where this virus is most prevalent. The Wadi Anti Retroviral Treatment Center for HIV/AIDS commenced regular operations in March last year.

It has a complement of trained medical and para-medical staff and caters exclusively to the general public. We became the first corporate in the country to have established a standalone center of this kind. It is also the first outside the Government sector to be included in the list of NACO's approved ART Centers in the country.

Knowledge Development

The prestigious Sumant Moolgaokar Technical Institute at Kymore was opened with a new educational curriculum to complement the education provided at ITI's.

Similarly the focus of the Regional Training Center in Jamul, Chattisgarh was redirected to offer professional technical courses of relevance to manufacturing sectors such as cement.

A state-of-the-art Learning Center, ACC Academy, was opened at our Thane complex. We began work on partnering with the government and industry to upgrade the 7 ITI's located near our plants.

Sustainable Construction

We are partnering with Holcim Foundation for Sustainable Construction to promote the concept of sustainable construction in India.

We signed an understanding with Development Alternatives to create a Center of Excellence to pursue solutions for sustainable housing and rural infrastructure, by providing innovation support, capacity building and outreach services to the construction industry and to enable the creation of livelihood opportunities and provide support to small rural entrepreneurs in rural habitat and infrastructure.

Other initiatives Sustainable Development

Other significant achievements included promotion of nation-wide services in Waste Management, and the commissioning of a Wind Farm in Tamil Nadu.

Planning and measuring effectiveness

A CSR Business plan and roadmap has been made listing yearly targets, priority areas and tasks from 2008 till 2011. We adopted 2 good participative practices last year. The first is a model that helps matches areas which are of concern to various stakeholder groups with their impact on the company.

The second is a scorecard that attempts a qualitative assessment of the impact and efficacy of individual community development schemes. We have tested this process successfully and will henceforth use it to measure the effectiveness of all major schemes.

Case Study II

Name: Ambuja Cements Limited

Thematic Areas: Poverty Reduction, Reducing Child Mortality, HIV/AIDS, Education and Environment

Case Study:

Ambuja Cements Ltd. established a foundation, called the Ambuja Cement Foundation in 1993. With its cement plants being situated in the rural areas, the Company realised the need to address the needs of the rural people. These people formed direct or indirect stakeholders of the Company and therefore were important for the Company's sustainability.

Consequently, the ACF's focus has been on integrated rural development programmes. The Foundation works with the mission to "energise, involve and enable communities to realize their potential".

It upholds as its guiding light the parent company's core values and alongside pays due attention to international trends in social development, expressed through guidelines like the Millennium Developmental Goals. Poverty alleviation, achieving universal primary education, reducing child mortality, improving maternal health, combating HIV/AIDS and ensuring environmental sustainability are all integral to the work of the Company and its Foundation.

The Foundation in each location begins by working at the micro level/in a small way with the villages impacted by the Company's operations and gradually over time as partnerships develop expands its area and scope of work. The Foundation at present reaches out to over 1.2 million people in about 670 villages spread across ten states in India.

The large chunk of work of the Foundation is carried out by a team of well-trained and experienced professionals. The range of work of the Foundation is expansive/ diverse and though there are common programmes run across locations, regional variations due to local needs exist.

Provision of preventive and curative health services including reproductive and child health, promotion of education and generation of alternate sources of livelihood coupled with capacity building are some of the key areas of intervention of the Foundation.

Natural Resource Management (NRM) by far forms the largest part of the community initiatives of the Company. NRM includes activities centered on conservation and management of water, land, energy and livestock. Water being the prime mover in rural life and an essential factor for overall rural development, prescribes their work in the area of water re-source management.

In all its endeavors, ACF has since inception made it a mandatory practice to include people's participation in its activities. Those who are stakeholders in the social setting are consciously and regularly included in programmes that are principally meant for them.

They engage with their communities at all levels. Programmes are decided based on the needs expressed by the people during Participatory Rural Appraisals (PRAs). Implementation is carried out with the participation of the people - whether direct or indirect, financial or non-financial. This helps in developing a sense of belonging to the programmes and makes the programmes sustainable.

Natural Resource Management, especially water management, forms a significant part of their work in the rural sector. Water management and conservation is a very broad area of intervention.

The diverse geographical, climatic, topographical and cultural variations across the states have made it necessary for them to make suitable modifications in their water projects to cater to the particular requirements and problems of different regions. Substantial water resource management activities are conducted in 4 states –Gujarat, Rajasthan, Maharashtra and Himachal Pradesh.

Each of these states faced specific water- related problems which they have tried to address through their scientifically grounded, economically viable and socially acceptable techniques. A brief description of the water projects in these states follows.

Salinity Ingress Reduction

In the state of Gujarat the rural communities are situated along the coastal belt in Junagadh and Amreli Districts. Due to over-utilisation and over-exploitation of ground water over years, these areas faced a serious salinity ingress problem. The rivers in this area were seasonal and the ponds that were fed by these rivers also dried up by the time winter arrived making the water problem even worse.

To tackle these problems, ACF adopted innovative techniques like interlinking of water bodies, tidal regulators and rivers through link water channels. This technique proved to be effective in collecting the run-offs of the rivers and consequently increased the quantity of water being saved and stored.

Ground water was recharged and the salinity levels of the underground water declined to improve the quality of water. The mined out pits of the Company have been converted into water reservoirs creating a store of 11.04 MCM of water for the use of the people.

Parts of Rajasthan being desert areas have for centuries had chronic water scarcity. The rainfall in the state is scanty and often uncertain. Rivers are seasonal and traditional ponds have over the years become silted and hold lesser and lesser quantities of water with each passing year.

The ground water is characterised by high fluoride and other salts contents that are known to be hazardous to health. ACF is situated in the Jaitaran block of Pali and Mundwa block of Nagaur District in this State.

The water problems here were addressed in 2 ways – by revival of old water reservoirs and construction of new structures to collect water. Traditional ponds were deepened and de-silted so that they would hold water for upto 10–12 months in the year as opposed to only 3–4 months.

Dykes were constructed in the rivers that directly impacted the ground water level and at the same time the river banks were de-silted. These immediately raised the water level by an average of 14 feet. Agricultural productivity increased. As in Gujarat, Roof Rain Water Harvesting (RRWHS) structures were constructed in Rajasthan too. These structures helped households collect monsoon water and store it for use through the year.

In the hilly state of Himachal Pradesh, the local people depend heavily on the forests for their livelihood. The terrain makes storage of water and conservation of the top soil issues of serious consideration. NRM in the State is aimed at enabling the people to manage their own resources and derive a fair share from them. Water shed development covered 9000 Ha in the last 4 years.

As a result of decreased soil erosion and increased moisture, the agricultural production has gone up. The water and soil conservation programme along with forestation have shown good results. Farmers are able to grow more than one crop a year. Their cropping pattern has diversified and consequently their incomes have increased. Wastelands have been developed as pasture lands, which have benefited villagers owning cattle. The milk yield of the cattle has also seen an improvement as a result of this.

ACF is active in Rajura, Korpana and Jivati blocks of Chandrapur District in Maharashtra. The focus in this State has been improving access and availability of potable water. For this, old ponds were renovated and brought into use once again. Streams and rivers were de-silted. Wherever possible check dams were built, bore wells dug and storage structures constructed. To address soil erosion, large tracts were collected under bunding and gully plugging. A fall out of these activities was that the availability of water for agricultural and household uses improved and a positive impact on agricultural productivity was noted.

Detailing specific project: Salinity Ingress Mitigation

The water resource management work has been going on for the longest duration in Kodinar, Junagadh District, Gujarat. The scope of work being done here is extensive. As a result of numerous factors, salinity ingress is a serious problem in this location. With the increase in the population, demands on existent water resources have increased and therefore there has been an over-exploitation of these resources.

With the fragmentation of the joint family system, each of the nuclear family unit involved in agriculture is increasing the number of wells and extensively using pumps to meet their increasing water demands.

Water intensive crops have been artificially introduced in the area, sharply increasing the demand on water for agricultural purposes. Mismanagement and misuse of water along with recurrent droughts have further worsened the situation.

The cumulative impact of all these occurrences has been that the villagers have been facing water shortage along with salinity ingress in this area.

Taking into consideration the scale of the problem, multiple interventions were planned and implemented by ACF and the rural people. This multi-pronged approach included the following:

Interlinking of rivers and canals

They initiated an innovative intervention technique of inter-linking local rivers and canals. This was done in a relatively limited geographical area where the distance between the rivers and /or canals wasn't too large.

A large amount of water in Kodnar gets wasted because it gets drained into the sea.

This water was diverted into nearby water bodies through channels. In interlinking, excess water from one source flows into the next, almost completely eliminating water wastage.

Water conservation structures like check dams have been made at appropriate places along the rivers and streams in-creasing recharge of the entire area. Villagers provided crucial information for this project. Having inhabited the area for generations, they were able to help locate the potential sinks and the shortest routes to these, which were essential for identifying watershed dynamics.

There have been direct benefits of this project. The crops in the region have diversified because of increased availability of water; and there is now a sustained water table. Farmers are now also growing crops and vegetables which are less water intensive.

The household income of the farming families has resultantly increased. We have been successful in changing the farming practices of the cultivators. The crop yields have also in-creased.

Pond deepening and interlinking

In 1999–2000 an interlinking project was undertaken that involved five adjacent villages. The village ponds in these villages were identified and deepened to increase their capacity and interlinking canals were constructed between villages.

During monsoons, the stream overflowed and the excess water got collected in these ponds. After the water level passed a stipulated height in one pond, it automatically got diverted to the next interlinked pond, thereby preventing wastage of water.

The total storage capacity of 0.42 million cubic meters benefited 339 wells and 1161 hectares of parched land thereby benefiting 316 farmers of the region. A lot of water that used to flow into the sea in the past has now been diverted into the downstream ponds which were previously starved of water. An analysis of the impact of this project showed a drastic reduction in the salinity in the area and farmers are now able to cultivate three crops in a year, as against one earlier. Due to the reduction in the salinity, now farmers also require 30–60 percent less seeds for sowing as compared to earlier, while yield in Kg/Ha increase by an average of 55 percent for the 5 major crops being grown in this area.

Utilising mined out pits

ACL uses open cast mines to obtain limestone and marl that are essential for cement production. Owing to the mining, large pits measuring between 12 to 15 meters in depth are created. Generally these pits are reclaimed by filling, afforestation, pastureland development.

Tidal regulator

Tidal regulators were constructed by the Government to act as a barrier between the agricultural land and salinity. The regulators reverse the natural flow of water from the sea to the land. To further augment the benefits of the regulators, ACF excavated link canals from the tidal regulators to the villages.

This has given the villagers numerous benefits of the project. In just one village Panch Pipalwa 67 farmers covering an area of 234Ha benefited, with all their wells being recharged. There is now multi-cropping in the area and agriculture yields are higher by at least 30 percent and the salinity in drinking water wells has reduced.

Roof Rain Water Harvesting Structures

The droughts and water salinity in Kodinar area created a serious drinking water crisis for many years. Villagers were forced to either walk unreasonable distances to collect water or had to depend on the uncertain tanker water provided by the local authorities.

In almost all cases without exception, the women and girls in the families had to shoulder the responsibility of collecting water. This meant a large chunk of daytime was spent on this activity and very often young girls had to drop out of school to help out in this chore.

ACF has promoted a simple and cost effective means to deal with the problem. Roof Rain Water Harvesting Structures (RRWHS) have been built in homes. RRWHS are simple structures that collect fresh rain water during the monsoons and store it in underground tanks for use throughout the year.

In addition to the RRWHS, ACF has also renovated wells to provide drinking water to the villagers. The renovation of wells has greatly improved the quality of the water in these wells. In conclusion.

Their work in water management and salinity mitigation in Gujarat has become a model for them. They have applied some of the water management techniques to other locations and found them to be just as effective.

Their projects have been appreciated by their people and governmental and non-governmental organisations. They would be very keen in sharing their experiences and learning with other organisations working in the same field.

Case Study III

Name: Apollo Tyres Limited

Thematic Areas: Health

HIV-AIDS Programme in Apollo Tyres Ltd.

Background

Apollo started its fight against HIV-AIDS in a project called Healthy Highways. The project was in partnership with DFID and started in Sanjay Gandhi Transport Nagar in the year 2000.

Today Apollo has a comprehensive programme on HIV-AIDS focusing on its employees, customers and supply chain.

The programme focus is on building awareness and prevention aspect of the epidemic. The approach is to forge strategic tie-ups with organisations, which bring the technical skills and capacity building aspects in to the partnership.

Apollo Tyres Health Care Centers

Apollo Tyres Health Care Centers are targeted interventions for truckers. The location for clinics is identified on the HIV prevalence, density of trucking and mobile population and the current level of work being done by other organisations in the area. Currently, the company has 7 clinics running in North, West & South of India. All clinics are strategically located in transport nagars. Attached to HIV-AIDS, however the focus of the services provided is on HIV-AIDS.

The main components of the programme are:

(a) Behaviour Change Communication (BCC)

The communication is directed at increasing awareness regarding the basics of HIV/AIDS. The communication addresses the modes of transmission, myths regarding HIV, connection between sexually transmitted diseases and HIV through one-to-one and one-to-group interactions.

(b) Peer Educators

Building an effective peer educator network is the most important link of the entire program. The peer educators become imperative given the geographical spread of the transportnagars and the mobile nature of the population.

(c) Condom Promotion

Condom promotion takes place through free distribution as well as social marketing of condoms. These condoms are available at various outlets and strategic points within the transport nagars.

Also the outreach workers and the peer educators emphasise and educate the target audience on the correct usage and disposal of condoms.

Sexually Transmitted Diseases and Infection Identification and Treatment

The outreach workers and the peer educators are trained in the identification of sexually transmitted diseases and infections. There is a strong referral system in place and patients are by guided by the outreach workers and peer educators to the clinic.

The clinics provide treatment for sexually transmitted diseases and infections only. In case the doctor or the counselors are not satisfied they refer the patient for voluntary testing at the government hospitals. The pre and post test counseling is available at all Apollo Tyres Health Care Centers.

Workplace Programme

In June 2006 a workplace sensitisation programme was rolled out in partnership with International Labour Organisation. The programme targets 7500 employees across all locations of the company.

The programme started with a half day sensitisation of the top management of Apollo. A steering committee was formed post the sensitisation of the top management. About 26 ambassadors were identified and trained as master trainers in a two day workshop and simultaneously a survey to gauge the existing knowledge in the company was undertaken.

So far over 5000 employees have been covered under the programme. The next level of this programme is targeting contract workers.

Integration with Supply Chain

Extension of the HIV programme into the supply chain was a natural progression for ATL. Under this Apollo has taken the prevention and awareness programme across its supply chain.

The model is similar to the employee engagement programme wherein a peer educator network is trained by Apollo's master trainers. The objective is to create a chain which has a multiplier effect in carrying the message on prevention forward.

Monitoring, Reporting & Evaluation

- The reporting system is standardised and a common format is available with all clinics to file a monthly report. The reports capture all details of BCC, STI and counseling at the centers. The reports provide both quantitative and qualitative aspect
- A monthly report is filed by the master trainers for the workplace programme as per ILO's format
- A monthly report is received from supply chain partners and also by Apollo
- A six monthly detailed report is filed to steering committee on the entire committee

A study on an annual basis is undertaken to gauge the impact of the programme across the target segments. The first one has been conducted in December 2007

Community Development at village 'Ramthenga', Jajpur Dist, Orissa

Community participation

- (i) To help the village become socially conscious
- (ii) To improve the general health of the villagers
- (iii) To improve community participation
- (iv) To help them become self-reliant.

This village is dominated by the tribal population – 'Santhal Tribe'. Their socioeconomic status was highly impoverished. Most of the villagers worked in the neighboring mines. Due to prolonged and non-conductive working environment, they had developed severe respiratory / skin infections.

The children did not attend any school and the nutrition status of the children was very poor. There was also a severe problem of alcohol abuse amongst the men. The women were suppressed and worked in the farm as well as in the mines. Lack of availability of water was also one of the main concerns of the villagers. There were bore wells but they were non-functional.

Major interventions were required in the area of:

- Health
- Education
- Awareness about health/ sanitation/ hazards of working in the mines
- Precautions to prevent respiratory illness
- Making water available

Having understood the need of the community, BPCL constituted a team to implement the work in the community. The main participants in the project were :

- Villagers
- NGO partner – Research Analysis Consultants
- BPCL LPG Team based in Bhuvaneshwar and Khurda headed by TM Khurda
- BPCL HR Team at Kolkata headed by HR Chief and CSR co-ordinator

- BPCL Corporate CSR Team headed by GM (Admin)

Strategy & Execution

A plethora of activities were undertaken in the village. However, depending upon the need at that particular time, the activities were phased out. The activity matrix developed was very strategically planned and executed.

Phase 1

A visit was made to the village by BPCL Kurda Team. There was lot of inhibition among the villagers to discuss and participate. However with repeated visits the villagers began to open up.

Since there was a need to execute the project very professionally, the BPCL Khurda Team identified an NGO with its main office in Bhuvaneshwar. The NGO had extensive experience of having worked in the mentioned areas and implemented community development projects.

The NGO did a need assessment of the village with complete village participation. Assistance for providing health services and primary education emerged as one of the main needs.

Also what emerged from the need assessment was to enable the formation of Self Help Groups. The general participation level among the villagers was very high.

Phase 2

BPCL supported the project through NGO RAC by:

Providing the services of a doctor (from neighboring area)

The Homeopathic Doctor would check the patients for free thrice in a week. Since the medicines were sweet there was less resistance among the villagers and children to eat the same. Moreover for the problems that they were more succumbing to, like respiratory illness, skin infections, homeopathic medicines were much more effective.

Initiating a Balwadi (pre-primary) for children within the village

This put the children into the habit of attending school especially when their parents would go to work in the mine. The teacher for the village was identified from within the village. She was subsequently trained about innovative methods in teaching and needs of pre primary children. She was also the main force in convincing the parents to put the children in main school after their pre primary.

Phase 3

Once the basic trust level amongst the villagers was attained, then:

Awareness was created about precautions for working in the mines

Awareness was created amongst the villagers about the precautions they need to take while working in the mines nearby. The modes of communication were through street plays, skits during village festivals, drawing competitions for children.

The homeopathic doctor played a vital role in creating this awareness. A lot of awareness was also created about alcohol abuse.

Deepening of village pond and encouraged fishery

There was a pond in the village, which had to be cleaned. With support from RAC the villagers engaged in cleaning the pond and also dredging the same. With the help of Central Institute of Fresh Acqua Culture, Bhuvaneshwar, the villagers were trained of fishery management. It was a community pond, and the fishes caught were shared by the villagers this activity was more favored by villagers during monsoon, when there is ample of water in pond.

Need for formation of Self Help Groups (SHG's)

The fishery management activity established the need for the formation of Self Help Groups – A group which would be trained in activities that can generate income. Meetings were held in the village for formation of Self Help Groups.

Repair and maintenance of Bore wells

Availability of water was an area of concern for the villagers. There were bore wells in the village, but they were non-functional. With the help of volunteers from the village, the bore wells were repaired and the villagers were also trained to maintain the same. Now there is ample water to sustain throughout the year.

Phase 4

The first batch of SHG was formed comprising of mainly women.

Formation of 1st SHG in the village

The group comprised mainly of women. They had mutually agreed to learn stitching and appliqué work (a form of embroidery famous in Eastern India). BPCL supported by way of providing teacher from the nearby village and also 4 sewing machines. Initially the women used to learn stitching work etc in the spare time they got after working in the mines.

Subsequently when the first batch finished the course, simultaneously a course was conducted on marketing the stitched products. A group of women were trained to market the stitched products in the local haats (local bazaar). The course included:

- Communication skills
- Perceiving the market requirements
- Quality of stitched products
- Pricing the clothes stitched
- Co-ordination within SHG
- Roles and responsibilities

The group slowly began to generate income through stitching and that made a breakthrough in the village.

The women from the SHG were able to, though in very small way, substitute the family income which came mainly from mining and agriculture. More and more women began to learn stitching and discontinued the mining job.

Promoting Mushroom Cultivation

The NGO assisted the villagers through the SHG to initiate mushroom cultivation. The SHG would purchase mushroom sponge at INR 17 a packet from 'Orissa Institute of Agriculture and Technology' Bhubaneswar.

Each packet of sponge would generate approximately 1.5 kg of mushroom. This mushroom when sold generates INR 80 from the INR 17 per packet.

The villagers who had very poor health, especially the children were encouraged to include mushroom in their diet and the extra ones were sold in the local market. This activity also generated income for the SHG.

Phase 5

There were 2 well-functioning SHG's in the village. The success of the women's group SHG was instrumental in the formation of the 2nd group, which was a mixed group of men and women.

The good work done by SHG's in this village was duly recognised by the Block Development Officer (BDO), who in turn has rewarded them with the "BEST SHG AWARD" in the District. As an incentive they were given a sum of Rs 2 lakhs. With this, the SHG has bought a stone-cutting machine, which is in turn fetching the SHG INR 15,000 to 20,000 per month.

Where working in the mines the villagers use to earn a meager amount of INR 50 per day, and were employed hardly for 10 to 12 days in a month, now the members of the SHG earn INR 2000 per month, through the various activities of the SHG.

Phase 6

A new group of 20 villagers has been formed in the village, wherein they have been enrolled in an income generation programme – 'Agro Based'. They have been given 2000 banana plantations. The plantations are being grown on 2 hectares of a common land.

The offshoots of the plantations would be given to another 20 families free of cost. Once the fruit comes, a market linkage for the same has already been created. Through this activity the results are that each house hold is getting an additional income of INR 7,000 to 8,000 in the first year.

Another group of 20 villagers are being supported in poultry. In the first year itself all the group members will benefit. How-ever from the second year offspring of the nurtured animals will be freely distributed to other needy villagers and the process will continue.

Phase 7

Already necessary approvals have been obtained to support another set of 20 and 20 families by way of papaya cultivation under agro-based initiatives and goatry under non-farm sector.

This way the entire village will have been roped into diverse activities and each family is can earn extra income for the sustenance of the entire family.

The education of pre-primary students, which was initiated and supported by BPCL, has been withdrawn. The pre-primary education has now been taken over under central Government ICDS scheme.

This way the Corporations fund were more channelised to-wards health support, formation of SHG's and developing in-come generation programmes.

Evaluation of Success/Results

The impact of the whole programme has been overwhelming. In another two years, BPCL would be in a position to with-draw all the financial support being extended to this village, and extend its support to some other deserving village.

- Where the entire village was mainly into mining work, now there are hardly a couple of families
- There are two registered SHG's functioning very well with good co-ordination
- BPCL initiated pre-primary school and mid-day meal scheme, which has now been withdrawn and through the NGO made village, children receive the same benefit from central Governments ICDS scheme
- The State health workers are involved in creating awareness about health and hygiene issues in the village
- All the bore wells of the village are functional and there is no scarcity of water even during summers
- The pond, which was a breeding ground for mosquitoes, is now being utilised for fishery

- The SHG group members are earning a steady income of INR 2000 per month
- The members of the banana plantations and poultry are earning an additional income of INR 7,000 to 8,000 per annum
- The work done by SHG's in this village has been recognised by the Block Development Officer (BDO), who in turn has rewarded them with the "BEST SHG AWARD" in the District.

The entire project has created goodwill for the company in the hearts of villagers in and around Ramthenga. More so the success from this project has given us the confidence about project replication in other regions.

Case Study V

Name: Coca-Cola India Inc

Thematic Areas: Health, Environment, Education, Livelihood

Case Study:

According to Atul Singh, President & CEO, Coca-Cola India, "We at Coca-Cola are committed to refresh the lives of communities on an everyday, all-day basis. As part of the same strategy, sustainable water management remains our top priority. We will continue to find innovative solutions in all areas of water management through our integrated 4 R strategy. Starting in 2000, over the last 7 years, we have taken the lead in improving water use efficiency by nearly 30 percent in our operations across India."

They identify partners primarily on the basis of the need of a specific project, understand their experience and expertise in specific fields; their ability to deal/engage with the community; their working relationships with other stakeholders such as the government at state/local or district level; their commitment to make the project sustainable; manage crisis as and when they arise etc.

They form a group comprising of experts from (within the system) departments such as Technical, Public Affairs & Communications, Regional bottling units and the implementing agency; visit the project sites; interact with the community frequently; understand the progress and impact of the project.

So far, the Company's water initiatives have improved the lives of more than 140,000 Indians and made millions more aware of the crucial importance of water conservation.

The Company's aim is to return whatever water it has been drawing from the ground by 2009 through water conservation projects.

To this effect, they have taken the lead in improving water use efficiency by nearly 30 percent in our operations across India and have returned 85 percent of the total water that we have returned approximately 85 percent of the water that they have drawn from the ground"

Their key activities include:

(a) Rain Water Harvesting

Working alongside local NGOs and communities, Coca Cola India has been installing rooftop rainwater harvesting projects at all of its bottling plants in India besides other communities and has also has been installing checkdams, recharge shafts etc in rural areas.

In Delhi alone, the existing RWH structures have the potential to harvest over 100 million liters of rain water.

Other key watersustainability projects that have run alongside the rainwater harvesting programmes are the construction of check dams.

(b) Check dams

In Andhra Pradesh, in partnership with the Hyderabad Urban Development Agency, local village committees and NGOs, Coca-Cola India has helped 16,000 villagers of Saroor Nayar restore existing “check dam” water catchment areas.

The project involved removing silt, recreating the pond and making the check dam with strengthened stone in order to stop the decline in groundwater levels.

In Bangalore, Karnataka, the Company recently dedicated a Check Dam at Kurubarakarena Halli.

With a capacity to harvest 1080 Kilo liters (1080000 litres) of rain water per annum, this Check Dam with a catchment area of 2 Sq Km will benefit 3000 people in the villages around. The system helps in recharging (improving water levels) of 30 bore wells around the check dam area.

(c) Recharge Shafts

Also in Rajasthan, in its many arid open areas, the Company has undertaken the construction of more than 100 Recharge Shafts where rainwater collects but does not percolate into the ground due to the nature of the soil.

Today, nearly 15,000 villagers are reaping the benefits of a steady or increasing water table without having the need to further deepen their existing bore wells.

The result of the water programmes is an increase in the amount of ground water available to local residents. Studies of the Rajasthan State Ground Water Board, for example, show the 2005 Kaladera ground water level was 21.85 meters below the ground, up from 22.23 meters in 2004.

(d) Restoring Old Water Bodies

In Rajasthan, one of the driest states of India, Coca-Cola has aided the restoration of a series of ancient and historic “Bawari”, or step well, water catchment systems.

The 400-year-old Sarai Bawari and Kala Hanuman ki Bawari, both located on the Delhi-Jaipur Highway in Jaipur, have both been completed and residents in the nearby communities are now able to draw drinking water from them.

The restoration project of Kale Hanuman ki Bawari witnessed active community involvement in the selection of the project site, design, source of supply for labor and material, implementation and creation of awareness for the project.

The actual restoration work included the removal of silt, rubble and algae, repairs to the infrastructure in the traditional “Jaipuri” style, and re-opening of the facility for use.

Today, thousands of gallons of water flow into the step wells from underground pores or streams, and the storage and recharge capacity has reached more than 8m liters of water. More than 3,000 villagers near each of the Bawari now have a sustained source of clean water. In addition, both step wells are now fully restored heritage sites and tourist attractions.

Facilitating Water Access

In its aim to provide access to clean drinking for the under-privileged in and around Chennai and in northern parts of Tamil Nadu covering the districts of Thiruvannamalai, Vellore, Kanchipuram and Chengelpet, the Company has launched Elixir of Life, which is a convergence of the vision of the 2 partners – Rotary International and Coca-Cola India, and is an extension of the Rotary’s ‘Schools into Smiles’ project that envisages betterment of the quality of lives of students.

Elixir of Life is enhancing the quality of life of students in these schools as unsafe water is the root cause for most of the health hazards and fatal diseases affecting young children, and in particular those from the underprivileged sections in the country.

These children are more susceptible to the water-borne diseases and the project is helping to realise one of their distant dreams by making clean drinking water available to them.

The unique aspects of the Elixir of Life project include a pioneering initiative to maintain the system for the next 3 years. In addition to this, a comprehensive maintenance and servicing protocol has been prepared for ensuring the ongoing success of this project.

This includes fortnightly inspection, cleaning of raw and treated water tanks, rinsing and flushing of micron filters, apart from emergency breakdown and repair service.

When Rotary celebrated the 100th year during 2004–05, RI District 3230 planned to execute a landmark project to commemorate the centenary year. The team surveyed 1,200 schools in five northern districts of Tamil Nadu and selected the 100 worst schools.

Thereafter, these schools were adopted through different Rotary Clubs which reconstructed the schools and added new class rooms, compound walls, good toilet/water facilities, besides providing noon meal kitchens, desks and benches.

The Schools into Smiles project is being continued this year by adding more schools but, at the same time, in order to improve the existing schools which have already been renovated, the Elixir of Life project has been launched with the support of Coca-Cola India so that every child gets access to potable water.

As of now the project has been completed in 20 Schools impacting the lives of around 10,000 children.

Creating Awareness

Besides the quantitative results, Coca-Cola's water initiatives in India have ushered in a new wave of water consciousness. Millions of Indians are being made aware of the importance of water management through the Company's marketing activities and other different fora in partnership with key institutions across the country.

Seminars/Workshops; Jal Yatra; Jaldhara Karavan; Jal Bima Abhiyan; Jal Sanchay Abhiyan; Film on Water Conservation, Community Mobilisation Programme, India celebrations on Water Water Day and World Environment Day, key events with Assocham, CII, FICCI, Rotary etc.

Playing the Role of a Mentor

The Company would be happy to play the role of a mentor in setting up water conservation projects on which it has developed core expertise.

Case Study VI

Name: DLF Limited

Thematic Areas: Rural Development, Urban Community Development, Education and Environment

Case Study:

While DLF continues to create world class infrastructure throughout India, it has not lost sight of its responsibilities as a change agent for accelerating the pace of social and economic transformation across various segments.

Even though there has been tremendous improvement in construction technology and quality, it is distressing to note that the people who actually make all the glitzy buildings are a neglected lot and are often required to do so in inhuman conditions. The sight of construction workers and their children living in jhuggies without even the basic facilities at most of the construction sites is not uncommon.

At DLF it has been our constant endeavor to improve the living conditions of our construction workers by providing them all the basic necessities at the site itself by efficient and effective space management.

DLF seized the initiative in this respect and became a pioneer in providing all necessary facilities to its construction workers on site when it tied up with Laing O Rourke for construction projects.

As a pilot project the site selected was an area of approximately 42 acres in village Silokhera district Gurgaon where an IT Park of 10 million sq feet was to come up. The construction on this site is slated to be completed by 2010.

The total workforce currently deployed at the site consists of about 6000 people. Out of this 5500 are essentially construction labor, with 500 supervisors. Further 1500 people are with families and 3500 are single. There are a total of 4200 men, 1800 women and 2000 children.

Before commencement of the construction a suitable location was identified on site for construction of hutments to house the workforce for the entire duration of the project. Instead of constructing makeshift or temporary accommodation, a budget of INR 6 crores was sanctioned to build a mix of cemented hutments and dormitories for the workers.

The entire area was paved to ensure easy access even during the monsoons and the work of sanitation and housekeeping was outsourced to a third party namely M/s Lion Services.

All the residential accommodation is provided with electricity, water, fans, beds and linen, and separate areas have been provided for toilets and washing. In order to take care of the children of the workers mobile crèches have been made available on site through a strategic tie up with an NGO.

A subsidised canteen manned by a third party has also been made available on site to ensure hygienic and good quality food on site. Medical help is available on site along with a 24 hour ambulance to take care of emergencies.

In order to improve the skills of the workers as well as train potential workers on site a non-profit residential "Apprentice Training Centre" for imparting skills in carpentry and masonry has also been constructed.

This model is being replicated in 17 sites all over India catering to a workforce of approximately 20,000 workers. It is pro-posed to extend this model to all future sites being developed by DLF.

If all construction companies were to adopt a similar approach then the construction workers would not be forced to live in inhuman conditions on site for the duration of the time they spend in creating the infrastructure which becomes the pride of the nation.

Case Study IX

Name: JSW Steel

Thematics: Women Empowerment

Case Study:

Data Halli – Building and Running a Rural BPO for Women The JSW Group of Companies has interests in core manufacturing, energy and infrastructure areas. In almost all areas, the manufacturing facility/ operation is in remote locations, far from the cities.

The primary source of income in these areas is farming. As new manufacturing facilities are built in these areas, the skill sets of the population around the facilities do not always meet the requirements of the operations. Providing meaningful employment to the local population is thus seen as a challenge.

In order to provide a sustainable and alternate livelihood to the population around the facilities, JSW Foundation, which manages the CSR activities of the JSW Group, embarked upon a novel approach of building a BPO at these remote locations? This gave an alternative employment avenue to the rural men and women, thus empowering them socially and economically.

The idea was spearheaded by Mrs. Sangita Jindal, Chairperson of JSW Foundation. The first BPO at Toranagallu was inaugurated on 15th August 2006. The BPO focuses on non-voice activities and is located adjacent to the JSW Steel Ltd.'s Toranagallu facilities, near Bellary, Karnataka. Starting with a mere 40 men and women, the BPO now employs about 200 women.

The concept of a rural BPO sounds unique and challenging, primarily because BPOs are typically associated with cities. This unique Innovation turns this concept on its head and has demonstrated that the stigma associated with BPOs can be challenged and proven otherwise. Considering the location and activities carried out at the BPOs, the name Data Halli was selected. Halli, in Kannada, means village.

Focusing on womenfolk in the rural areas, where education levels are also lower than in the cities, the rural BPO provides an avenue for these womenfolk to work outside their conventional livelihood and enrich their lives, with the aim of empowering women socially and economically.

JSoft Solutions Ltd., the IT & ITES Company in the JSW Group, currently runs a non-voice BPO at Toranagallu, next to the JSW Steel Ltd.'s Integrated Steel Plant at the same location. The BPO focuses on data entry activities for multiple clients and employs about 200 women.

Plans are afoot to open more such BPOs across the country.

Most women come with little or no exposure to computers. A computer skill is therefore not mandatory. The eligibility criteria are simple - should be 18 years or above and should have passed the SSLC examination.

Upon joining the BPO, the women are given training for a period of 3 to 6 months, depending on their grasping ability, on basic typing, English reading etc. - skills that enable them to be productive, earn a decent living and deliver value at the BPO. In addition, professional training, specific to the projects on hand, is provided for up to 2 months.

Most women come from the near-by villages, from up to a radius of about 60 km. Buses are provided for pick-up and drop from the village to the work spot. In order to take the skills development to the doorsteps, the requisite software is also installed at the village schools where JSW Foundation runs Computer-aided Learning Centers (CALCs).

These are supervised by the BPO women from the same village. Potential candidates therefore do not need to travel to the BPO to develop the requisite skills.

The rural BPO has had a positive impact on many persons. As the nature of the initiative suggests, this impact has been significant on the employees of the BPO. Some of the impact areas are:

- Transformed simple village girls into matured, positive, confident and economically independent professionals who hold a respectable place in their homes and are looked upon as examples of transformation in the villages
- Encouraged villages girls to continue their education up to 10th or 12th Standard, an impossible task prior to the BPO
- Has given them the courage to postpone their marriages which would have otherwise made them wives and mothers at the young ages of 14 or 15
- Teaching of English and Personality Development has boosted their self-confidence and has made them socially known figures in their society as they are now affiliated with a large entity, namely, the JSW Group
- Sowed the seeds of leadership in these ladies by giving them job responsibilities of Supervisors, Trainers, etc., through which they lead their respective teams which has in turn helped in showing them a career path
- Equal employment opportunity is given to quite a few physically challenged ladies who have carved their own identity
- Providing a springboard to look for better work opportunities in the vicinity

Along the way, there have been many challenges – social barriers, resistance from the men folk at home, training, technology, quality of work, transportation, shift working, etc.

Some of the challenges faced were:

Internal Challenges

Skepticism about viability of the Concept

Overcome by focused efforts to streamline the processes, at-tack the issues on hand and hire managerial talent with BPO experience. All this led to a turn-around in the operations and show-casing of the BPO for everyone to see the success.

Lack of infrastructure (IT, space, people, etc.) to handle the daily stream of potential candidates

Overcome by taking the skills development to the villages via the CALCs, thus building a resource pipeline.

External Challenges

Lower Quality and Throughput

Overcome by providing adequate training, dummy projects and hand-holding. With the implementation of a batch tracking software, Individual performance and throughput is also monitored and tracked

Hesitation by the village folk to send their women folk away from their villages

Overcome by arranging for transport up to the villages and making the BPO an all-women

Name: Reliance Industries Limited

Thematic Areas: Microfinance, Education, Environment, Health, Livelihood, Community Development, Child Welfare and Infrastructure Development

Case Study:

Vision: What is good for India is good for Reliance

Reliance Industries Limited has embraced sustainability as a core business strategy and regards sustainability as a foundation for lasting economic success. After all, sustainability is about meeting the needs of the present generation without di-luting the ability of the future generation to meet their needs.

Their commitment to sustainability is backed by active initiatives on the ground, together with a detailed reporting system with third party external assurance certification. Further, they actively engage with their stakeholders (along with their partners who are associated with their various CSR projects) to take their feedback and monitor the progress of the work.

Their maiden Corporate Sustainability Report (2004-05) re-port was the first Corporate Sustainability Report from the Indian Oil & Gas sector. Further, this report obtained "in-accordance" 2002-guidelines status from the Global Re-orting Initiative (GRI) - the official collaborating centre of the United Nations Environment Program (UNEP).

Pursuing their goal of continual improvement in their reporting, the report for FY 2005-06 has an enhanced scope based upon the feedback received for its maiden CSR. Further, it focuses on "issues" and "stakeholders" and includes numerous case studies from different locations and divisions. This report is the only "GRI Checked A+ level" rating report from India.

Their belief, "What is good for India is good for Reliance", drives their effort in positively impacting the life of more than one billion Indians.

They will use sustainability to drive process innovation, new product development, improving manufacturing efficiencies and reducing material and energy consumptions.

They manufacture products that have made a positive impact on millions of people in the country, i.e. fuels for transportation, plastic bags to fiber optics, synthetic fabrics to name a few. Continuing this strategy is their plan to provide a cleaner fuel to millions of households by way of natural gas.

On the health front, they have the distinction of being the founder member of the India Business Alliance of the World Economic Forum. They have resolved to share the responsibility of combating diseases such as Tuberculosis (TB) and HIV/AIDS.

To achieve this, they have collaborated with a large number of agencies working on these issues to create some rather unique Public-Private Partnerships (PPP).

In addition to setting up hospitals at some of their manufacturing locations, they offer medical services at all their manufacturing facilities and offices.

These includes free outdoor medical services for nearby communities, outreach mobile medical services, family planning camps, blood donation drives, antenatal check-ups, vaccination centers, pulse polio camps, school health check-ups, diagnostic multidisciplinary camps, eye camps and other out-reach programmes.

On December 28, 2006, over 40,000 villagers and other stakeholders located near their Dahej Manufacturing Division, Gujarat State, got a unique 'Gift of Life' from this manufacturing facility. In a unique public-private partnership initiative, Dahej Manufacturing Division in partnership with the State Government of Gujarat adopted the existing Public Health Centre (PHC). This is the only nearest public health centre located in this vicinity. The other nearest one is at least 45 to 50 kms away, located at district Bharuch.

Aligned with the goals and vision of the management, several educational initiatives have been proposed/ established as leaps into the future. These ventures aim at building confidence, capacity, global mindsets and communication skills among young people. Their growth will shape and give direction to the growth of our country.

Reliance Rural Development Trust has undertaken a unique corporate initiative to create infrastructure facilities in rural areas. The projects undertaken in rural areas are construction of roads, anganwadis (kindergarten school), panchayat offices and community halls. These are some basic development priorities of rural areas.

In order to give focused attention to the needs of surrounding rural communities, Baroda Manufacturing Division, Gujarat State, initiated a collective action programme by setting up a voluntary society SVADES with the co-operation of all the neighboring industries in Vadodara.

SVADES is a collective endeavor that binds industry and rural community together towards socioeconomic development in the rural areas surrounding the industry. SVADES works in 40 villages covering a population of nearly 200,000.

At Reliance a clean environment for sustainable development is of prime concern. At all their manufacturing sites lush greenery has been developed utilising treated effluents.

Some of their leading Other Community Initiatives

Road at Dwarka, guest house for devotees, electronic security services and maintenance at Dwarka; Gardening of air-port waste land; Gaushala (Cow shed); Cultural promotion programmes for all races; Road safety and emergency services on state highways; Greening and lighting of road di- viders; Sheets and Pipes for Jaipur Foot and Prosthesis with Bhagawan Mahaveer Viklang Sahayata Samiti, Jaipur; Community meals / providing potable water; Empowering women through formation of Mahila Mandals organising vocational training courses for women.

Further, Dhirubhai Ambani Foundation (DAF) - founded under the Patronage of Shri Dhirubhai Ambani (registered under the Bombay Public Trust Act in August 1995) - has been working in partnership with RIL in most of its social initiatives. Smt. Nita Mukesh Ambani leads the CSR initiative at DAF and RIL.

The overall objective of the Foundation is to make philanthropic interventions for the welfare of Indian Society and pro-mote sustainable development of its people through initiatives in the fields of: Health, Hygiene and Sanitation, Education.

Community Revitalisation, Promotion of Social and Economic welfare of and upliftment of the People; Conservation of Natural Resources, Environmental and Ecological Protection; Rural Development and Assistance to other organisations with similar objectives.

The DAF joined hands with the management of Sir Hurkison Das Nurrotum Das Hospital and Research Centre in December 1997 with the commitment to restore the hospital to its erstwhile glory. Consequently the hospital services were restructured and state-of-the-art healthcare technology, conforming to international standards was set up.

Project Drishti, launched, in 2003, in association with the National Association for the Blind (NAB - a non-profit institution serving the blind in India for over five decades) – is a nation-wide corneal grafting drive to bring light in the lives of visually challenged from the underprivileged segment of the society - has illuminated lives of over 5,000 Indians – all free of cost.

This project is the largest (corneal grafting surgery) project undertaken by any corporate entity in the country. Presently, this project has conducted corneal grafting surgeries in over 16 cities in India and efforts are on to spread to far-flung mofussil areas of the country.

Dhirubhai Ambani International School, Mumbai, provides international educational opportunities in the context of the emerging educational needs of students.

The school prepares students for the Indian Certificate of Secondary Education (ICSE), Cambridge University's International General Certificate of Secondary Education (IGCSE) and the International Baccalaureate Diploma (IB) examinations.

Faculty members with rich experience in national and international curricula, educate, mentor and guide the children through these developmentally critical years of growth.

Case Study XI

Name: Tata Steel Limited

Thematic Areas: Microfinance, Education, Environment, Health, Livelihood and Relief during calamities

Case Study:

Vision: To improve the quality of life of the employees and the communities we serve

Tata Steel Ltd, established in 1907, is India's first and fully-integrated steel plant located in Jamshedpur, having employee strength of over 42,000.

As a conscious Corporate Citizen, Tata Steel Ltd is committed to improving the quality of life of its employees and also of the citizens residing in and around the Steel Works in Jamshedpur and the various out locations scattered in different states in the country as well as abroad.

These dual interventions in workplace and community have a far reaching impact. This responsible corporate citizenship is reinforced by the organisation by being a signatory to Global Compact and accepting and practicing the "Ten Principles" in total as well as being a Member of Global Business Coalition on HIV/AIDS.

HIV/AIDS is a disease that threatens to affect communities all over the world and especially the young and productive industrial workforce.

Tata Steel Ltd's involvement vis-à-vis preventing HIV/AIDS dates back to early 1990s when the organisation realised that the disease had acquired epidemic proportions and accepted that its control or prevention was not the sole responsibility of the government.

It decided to respond to the situation by taking appropriate initiatives to safeguard health of the community and prevent spread of the disease.

Tata Steel Ltd., fully mindful of its role, promptly mobilised its resources and evolved a policy on control of HIV/AIDS. The policy is revisited every couple of years with inputs from HIV+ people, and the need of the stakeholders. It also formulated a strategy of creating mass awareness and educating the society to prevent and combat the menace of HIV/AIDS.

In 1994, the management of Tata Steel Ltd evolved a Corporate Sector Model to prevent STD/HIV/AIDS and constituted a Core Group – AIDS and Nodal Centre – AIDS to focus on this disease and formulate strategies for its control and prevention.

The members of Core Group – AIDS comprise experts from various divisions of the company e.g., Community Development & Social Welfare Department, Centre for Family Initiatives, Personnel, Tata Steel Rural Development Society, Tribal Cultural Society, Public Health & Medical Division as well as invitees from local governmental and private organisations. Convener Core Group – AIDS, a technical person, was assigned full time by the Company to run the HIV/AIDS initiatives.

The members conduct AIDS Awareness Programmes especially for women and youth, using various IEC (Information-Education-Communication) media and forum, not only among the citizens in and around the Steel City, but also for those re-siding in (700) villages around its out-locations.

Feedback from the target group acts as input to further improve the programmes. Each year International Candlelight Memorial and World AIDS Day are observed to express solidarity with those affected by HIV/AIDS.

Testimony to Tata Steel Ltd's commitment to prevent and check HIV/AIDS disease is amply provided by the adoption of practice of non-discrimination between HIV infected employees and other employees. The Company firmly believes that by continuously informing and educating various levels of society, adequate awareness can be built in the community, which in turn would take appropriate preventive measures against the disease.

There is no pre-employment screening for HIV status. Confidentiality of HIV+ employees is maintained with continuation of their employment. They are re-located to assignments that are best suited to their physical ability and continue till they are medically fit to work.

Workplace programmes are conducted regularly with the help of HR Personnel for both the permanent employees as well as the contract labor which also helps sensitise employees and reduces stigma and discrimination. Approximately 250 AIDS Awareness Programmes are conducted every year in the workplace.

Comprehensive counseling, treatment and care including the Preventing Parent To Child Transmission Plus programme is provided through all health centers of Tata Steel such as:

Tata Main Hospital, an 850-bed modern specialty hospital and has an Out-patients Department in all specialties and provides "treatment without discrimination" to all positive people. All HIV+ employees or their dependents are provided with HAART free of cost by the Company

12 Out-patients clinics in Jamshedpur Township attached to Tata Main Hospital

21 Maternal & Child Health clinics of Tata Steel Family Initiatives Foundation and

4 Clinics of Tata Steel's Community Development & Social Welfare

Jamshedpur Blood Bank encourages voluntary blood donation which ensures availability of "safe blood."

A "Single window" health delivery concept, Sneh Kendra, was started to provide care and support to those affected by STI/HIV/AIDS. All cases detected HIV+ and their family members are finally referred here by above-mentioned agencies for on-going support. The family members of these patients regularly come for counseling, group support and life skills training.

They are also benefiting from programmes on vocational training, economic support for education of children, formation of Self Help Group for economic rehabilitation and sustainability.

To increase the reach of the programmes Peer leaders are identified in the community and trained. Internal and external experts are invited to conduct training and workshops for capacity building of knowledge and skills of all stakeholders in health and community-based care and support services on a regular basis.

Tata Steel Ltd believes in networking with like-minded agencies e.g. National AIDS Control Organisation (NACO), UN-AIDS, Global Business Coalition on HIV/AIDS (Tata Steel received an award for its HIV/AIDS initiatives in the community in 2003), ILO, CII-Indian Business Trust, WHO, JSACS, Transport Corporation of India Foundation (TCIF), PFI, The David & Lucile Packard Foundation to share resources.

To help the district health services Core Group – AIDS introduced computer-based Health Information Management System (HIMS) in Jamshedpur. Each month statistics on new HIV+ cases from local Health Institutions is collated in the Civil Surgeon's office.

Tata Steel Ltd is a recipient of Global Business Coalition on HIV/AIDS Award 2003 for its initiatives on HIV/AIDS in the community.

9.4 CORPORATE SOCIAL RESPONSIBILITY VOLUNTARY GUIDELINES 2009 FROM MINISTRY OF CORPORATE AFFAIRS, GOVERNMENT OF INDIA

(1) FOREWORD

The Indian corporate sector has seen the current decade as a period of high growth and the emergence of a strong India Inc. having a significant global footprint. The decade also saw the financial crisis that shook the global markets. While the corporate sector is recovering from the jolt of the global financial crisis, the future is looking bright. However, the corporate sector is also standing in the midst of a sustainability crisis that poses a threat to the very existence of business. What we have before us is a cross-road where one path leads us to inclusive growth and the other may lead to unsustainable future. However, the first path will require careful nurturing for which all stakeholders need to assume and discharge their respective responsibilities.

We have seen the business sector generating wealth and value for the shareholders in the last sixty years, but simultaneously we also have the problems of poverty, unemployment, illiteracy, malnutrition etc. facing the nation. The corporate growth is sometimes seen as widening the gap between the India and Bharat through its income – skewing capability. This gap needs to be bridged. While the Government undertakes extensive developmental initiatives through a series of sectoral programmes, the business sector also needs to take the responsibility of exhibiting socially responsible business practices that ensures the distribution of wealth and well-being of the communities in which the business operates.

The Indian business has traditionally been socially responsible. From inactive philanthropy to the incorporation of the stakeholders' interest in the business model, the Indian business sector practices various methods of discharging its social responsibility. While a lot of human and economic energy is available for utilization in this area, a suitable mechanism is required to channelize this energy for which the Government, corporate sector and the communities need to partner together. Against this background, the Ministry of Corporate Affairs has decided to bring out a set of voluntary guidelines for responsible business which will add value to the operations and contribute towards the long term sustainability of the business. These guidelines will also enable business to focus as well as contribute towards the interests of the stakeholders and the society.

At a time when the Government is engaged with delivery of a gigantic national development initiative and is taking a leadership position on various global issues, I am sure that India Inc. will be ready to walk step in step with the Government to discharge their responsibilities towards national development. I look forward to more and more businesses in India adopting these voluntary guidelines and partnering in the endeavor of national development.

(2) PREFACE

The Ministry of Corporate Affairs has adopted the role of an enabler, facilitator and regulator for effective functioning and growth of the corporate sector. A number of initiatives are underway on the legislative, service delivery and capacity building sides so that the corporate sector is provided with a buoyant and enabling regulatory environment for its growth. Simultaneously, the Ministry is also focusing on various issues related to inclusive growth in relation to the development of corporate sector.

The subject of Corporate Social Responsibility has evolved during last few decades from simple philanthropic activities to integrating the interest of the business with that of the communities in which it operates. By exhibiting socially, environmentally and ethically responsible behaviour in governance of its operations, the business can generate value and long term sustainability for itself while making positive contribution in the betterment of the society.

Although we have seen a period of sustained economic growth in the current decade, we still continue to face major challenges on the human side in India. The problems like poverty, illiteracy, malnutrition etc. have resulted in a large section of the population remaining as “un-included” from the mainstream. We need to address these challenges through suitable efforts and interventions in which all the state and non-state actors need to partner together to find and implement innovative solutions.

Indian business has traditionally been socially responsible and some of the business houses have demonstrated their efforts on this front in a laudable manner. However, the culture of social responsibility needs to go deeper in the governance of the businesses. In order to assist the businesses to adopt responsible governance practices, the Ministry of Corporate Affairs has prepared a set of voluntary guidelines which indicate some of the core elements that businesses need to focus on while conducting their affairs. These guidelines have been prepared after taking into account the governance challenges faced in our country as well as the expectations of the society. The valuable suggestions received from trade and industry chambers, experts and other stakeholders along with the internationally prevalent and practiced guidelines, norms and standards in the area of Corporate Social Responsibility have also been taken into account while drafting these guidelines.

The Ministry would look forward to more and more business communities coming forward and adopting these guidelines. We would also welcome comments and suggestions from various stakeholders to enable us to further refine these guidelines and also work out the details of the operational guidance on the principles and core elements that we propose to include in the coming months. I am sure that India Inc. will accept the challenge in making the Indian corporate sector a global leader in responsible business.

(3) PREAMBLE

The 21st century is characterized by unprecedented challenges and opportunities, arising from globalization, the desire for inclusive development and the imperatives of climate change. Indian business, which is today viewed globally as a responsible component of the ascendancy of India, is poised now to take on a leadership role in the challenges of our times. It is recognized the world over that integrating social, environmental and ethical responsibilities into the governance of businesses ensures their long term success, competitiveness and sustainability. This approach also reaffirms the view that businesses are an integral part of society, and have a critical and active role to play in the sustenance and improvement of healthy ecosystems, in fostering social inclusiveness and equity, and in upholding the essentials of ethical practices and good governance. This also makes business sense as companies with effective CSR, have image of socially responsible companies, achieve sustainable growth in their operations in the long run and their products and services are preferred by the customers.

Indian entrepreneurs and business enterprises have a long tradition of working within the values that have defined our nation's character for millennia. India's ancient wisdom, which is still relevant today, inspires people to work for the larger objective of the well-being of all stakeholders. These sound and all-encompassing values are even more relevant in current times, as organizations grapple with the challenges of modern-day enterprise, the aspirations of stakeholders and of citizens eager to be active participants in economic growth and development.

CSR is not philanthropy and CSR activities are purely voluntary- what companies will like to do beyond any statutory requirement or obligation. To provide companies with guidance in dealing with the abovementioned expectations, while working closely within the framework of national aspirations and policies, following Voluntary Guidelines for Corporate Social Responsibility have been developed.

While the guidelines have been prepared for the Indian context, enterprises that have a trans-national presence would benefit from using these guidelines for their overseas operations as well. Since the guidelines are voluntary and not prepared in the nature of a prescriptive road-map, they are not intended for regulatory or contractual use.

While it is expected that more and more companies would make sincere efforts to consider compliance with these Guidelines, there may be genuine reasons for some companies in not being able to adopt them completely. In such a case, it is expected that such companies may inform their stakeholders about the guidelines which the companies have not been able to follow either fully or partially. It is hoped that "India Inc." would respond to these Guidelines with keen interest.

After considering the experience of adoption of these guidelines by Indian Corporate Sector and consideration of relevant feedback and other related issues, the Government may initiate the exercise for review of these Guidelines for further improvement after one year.

They may evolve a system of need assessment and impact assessment while undertaking CSR activities in a particular area. Independent evaluation may also be undertaken for selected projects/activities from time to time.
2. Companies should allocate specific amount in their budgets for CSR activities. This amount may be related to profits after tax, cost of planned CSR activities or any other suitable parameter.
3. To share experiences and network with other organizations the company should engage with well established and recognized programmes/ platforms which encourage responsible business practices and CSR activities. This would help companies to improve on their CSR strategies and effectively project the image of being socially responsible.
4. The companies should disseminate information on CSR policy, activities and progress in a structured manner to all their stakeholders and the public at large through their website, annual reports, and other communication media.

9.5 WHOLE LIFE COSTING - ASSESSMENT OF SOCIO-ECONOMIC IMPACT OF STRATEGIC AND OPERATIONAL DECISIONS OF BUSINESS

Introduction

Value for money is a concept that is frequently considered when an individual or an organisation is seeking to make a purchase or investment. When acquiring a new car, for example, we may consider the costs of ownership (fuel economy, insurance, maintenance, availability of replacement parts, etc.) when deciding between options. Implicitly then, we consider the long-term costs of ownership in the decision making process.

Furthermore, it could be argued that the larger the capital cost of a product, the more important it is to consider these long-term costs. Buildings are a prime example of high cost purchases, yet consideration of long-term costs is not given the attention it deserves. The past 30 years have seen many attempts to encourage a holistic approach to what is in effect 'whole life' cost analysis, but with limited success, particularly in the United Kingdom.

One such technique that is currently emerging in the industry is whole life-cycle costing (WLCC).

Whole life-cycle costing is a relatively new concept to the construction industry, albeit based upon the foundations of analytical techniques that have been in existence for some time. It is in essence an evolution of lifecycle costing (LCC) techniques that are now commonly used in many areas of procurement. Like LCC, the primary purpose of WLCC is to aid capital investment decision making by providing forecasts of the long-term costs of construction and ownership of a building or structure. However, unlike LCC it is also a dynamic approach, and can provide up-to-date forecasts on cost and performance throughout the life of the building. Some of the ideas behind the justification for WLCC are synonymous with key issues in today's construction industry:

- Meeting clients' expectations Clients (especially in the public sector) now require buildings that are efficient during and after construction. WLCC techniques can demonstrate real cost savings in design solutions
- Sustainability Achieving sustainable design solutions relies on the consideration of long-term operational costs and performance of building components
- Monitoring performance of constructed assets For example, are PFI/PPP (Private Finance Initiative/ Public-Private Partnerships) projects really cost effective? Only by considering the whole life-cycle costs can this be assessed. Using WLCC also supports benchmarking and key performance indicators.
- Monitoring cost effectiveness of constructed assets
- Lean Construction: By considering long-term cost and physical performance, waste is minimized both during construction and through the life of the building.

Whole life-cycle costing: a brief history

Prior to the 1970s, most clients, developers and professionals involved in building procurement made capital investment decisions solely on the basis of capital cost. Outside the construction industry, it was appreciated in some quarters that making decisions solely on capital cost could be folly. They believed that by possibly spending more in capital cost, the long term would realise substantial cost savings when compared with a cheaper alternative.

This school of thought was known as 'terotechnology', and it was in effect the beginnings of whole life-cycle cost theory. Within the construction industry, nevertheless, terotechnology was largely ignored. Some of the reasons behind this included an ignorance of the importance of whole life-cycle costs, lack of available data and data collection mechanisms, and the fact that those providing the capital generally had no interest in the subsequent operational costs of the building. In the early 1970s, the term 'cost-in-use' began to cost effective? Only by considering the whole life-cycle costs can this be assessed. Using WLCC also supports benchmarking and key performance indicators

- Monitoring cost effectiveness of constructed assets WLCC provides the means by which to constantly review this and base future capital investment on this information
- Lean construction By considering long-term cost and physical performance, waste is minimised both during construction and through the life of the building.

The aim of this chapter therefore is to provide a general overview of the fundamental ideas and principles behind WLCC and to demonstrate how it can be of benefit to the construction industry practitioner. The chapter initially examines the history of LCC and its various definitions, moving on to show how WLCC has evolved from LCC as a new and innovative cost analysis tool. The failings of previous LCC methodologies are examined by definition of the innovative aspects of WLCC. appear in the industry and the literature. Cost-in-use refers to the expenditure related to the operation of an asset. Although not related specifically to the construction industry, it was recognised that the underlying principles of costing use could apply to buildings and critical structures. What cost-in-use failed to consider, though, was the necessity for accurate future cost forecasting. It became clear then that some kind of technique was required to facilitate this.

It was not until the mid to late 1970s that LCC emerged as a solution to this problem. LCC fostered a wide-ranging approach to cost appraisal, encompassing all perceivable costs from construction through to eventual disposal –

'the whole life'. Using a variety of forecasting techniques, the analyst was able to demonstrate how increased capital cost could be offset by long-term cost savings. LCC sounded good in theory, but the practical implementation within the construction industry did not reflect this. In terms of the enlargement of life-cycle costing theory, the major factor which frustrated its development was lack of good quality cost-in-use and performance data. This proved to be the principal dissatisfaction felt by those who showed some willingness to employ life-cycle costing techniques.

In 1971, the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors established the Building Maintenance Cost Information Service (BMCIS) as a method of collecting operational and running cost data. Its main aim was to adopt a single classification system, which could then be disseminated among subscribers in a common demeanour. Although the BMCIS went some way to addressing the implementation problems of life-cycle costing, it did not address the need for a coherent framework and structure in which to deal most effectively with this information.

In 1977, the then UK Department of Industry published Life-cycle costing in the management of assets which presented one of the earliest definitions of LCC:

'A concept which brings together a number of techniques – engineering, accounting, mathematical and statistical – to take account of all significant net expenditures arising during the ownership of an asset. Life-cycle costing is concerned with quantifying options to ascertain the optimum choice of asset configuration. It enables the total life-cycle cost and the trade-off between cost elements, during the asset life phases to be studied and for their optimum selection use and replacement.' Since 1977, LCC has become widely reported on, with a diversity of models and techniques existing. In 1983, two eminent researchers in LCC, Roger Flanagan and George Norman, developed a framework for collecting data, which could then be used to build up the life-cycle cost of a project. By 1992, LCC was a familiar concept to building economists throughout the world, and as such became a recognised standard in the UK under British Standard BS 3843 (1992):

'The costs associated with acquiring, using, caring for and disposing of physical assets, including feasibility studies, research and development, design, production, maintenance, replacement and disposal; as well as all the support, training and operations costs generated by the acquisition, use, maintenance, and replacement of permanent physical assets.'

In 2000, this definition was revised and incorporated into ISO 15686 Part 1 – Service Life Planning which cites LCC as (ISO 2000):

‘A technique which enables comparative cost assessments to be made over a specified period of time, taking into account all relevant economic factors both in terms of initial capital costs and future operational costs.’

The BS/ISO definition, although authoritative, is a daunting and perhaps vague definition given the plethora of cost items that could be included within each cost category. Principally, the authors believe this to be one of the reasons why LCC is still rarely used to the extent that it was initiated for, although others argue that the lack of quality data is the principal reason.

Additionally, the plethora of cost models and definitions associated with LCC has been significant in creating an ‘air of confusion’ over the subject. Ambiguity and inconsistency were identified in Newton (1991), where consideration of the problem of model classification and the inability to compare models on a like-for-like basis are discussed. Furthermore, the individual perception of the life-cycle model raises many concerns. This is validated in Smith (1999), which highlights how LCC has for some time become an important issue in the overall cost picture, but has not featured in the decision making process to the same extent. This lends weight to the argument in Kirkham et al.

(1999) that in some respects LCC has remained an academic rather than a practical tool, and that presently the financial burden of implementing an LCC approach outweighs the advocated benefits.

By way of example, consider the application of LCC in other sectors. It has been widely used in the procurement of United States and Australian defence contracts for some time now (Australian National Audit Office 1998; US Department of Defense 1997, 2001). The sheer cost involved in these kinds of projects emphasises the need for LCC; that is, the possibility that significant capital outlay needs to be justified by the longer-term benefits. In some respects, research has shown that LCC has only been applied to projects that have a very high capital cost. In a significant amount of cases, it has been found that ignoring the likely future costs in the conception stage can lead to a significantly more costly endeavour in the future (Smith 1999).

Towards the late 1990s, the concepts of ‘whole life costing’ (WLC) and ‘whole life-cycle costing’ (WLCC) emerged. The terms whole life costing and whole life-cycle costing are interchangeable. WLCC is a new term that appears to have been adopted by many building economists involved in the preparation of forecasts for the long-term cost assessments of capital projects.

There has been debate amongst academics and practitioners as to whether a difference really does exist between WLCC and LCC. The key emphasis in most of the definitions lies in the implication that LCC is only concerned with the economic life of the building, in other words the period of commercial interest. It could be argued that WLCC forms the attempt by academia and practitioners to overcome some of the problems of LCC. Moreover, it takes into account the costs of running and operating a building over its entire life span – ‘the whole life’ – as opposed to over a specified period of time, which is a feature of LCC models. Notwithstanding, some have argued that WLCC is simply synonymous with LCC. Others have specified that a difference exists (Bourke & Davis 1999). In this book, the contention is that the concepts are indeed different and to justify this assumption an online survey was conducted (Boussabaine & Kirkham 2000). The authors sought to assess the opinions of academics and practitioners involved in LCC/WLCC, and to establish if the majority of individuals thought that there was real difference between the concepts. This survey forms part of the backbone of the definition of whole life-cycle costing taken in this book.

Defining whole life-cycle costing

The online survey revealed a broad spectrum of opinion about the difference (if any) between WLCC and LCC. The following are random examples of the responses:

‘The term. . . is whole life costing (WLC) and if you believe the old life-cycle costing (LCC) also included all capital and revenue costs for the whole business case/project and not merely elements, e.g. cladding, ceilings etc. then LCC and WLC are . . . the same thing.'

'By rights they should mean the same thing, with the "whole" being superfluous. When one considers a "life-cycle", its wholeness is implied. However, it [may be] possible that when some refer to LCC, they may be referring to the consideration of only costs incurred up to the point when the asset is no longer economically viable and ignoring the issues that relate to asset disposal – which is considered to be part of WLCC.'

'If LCC is anything like life-cycle assessment, its completeness is a continuum. . . . In practice, LCAs suffer dramatically from incompleteness, because environmental impacts have to be traced many transactions upstream. This is not a problem for LCC . . . I can't imagine what the problem would be regarding a small amount of information about the scope of LCC. Australian and New Zealand standards I have seen on LCC do not define WLCC. [Why] would the additional term be required?'

'I believe that WLC is simply the modern [equivalent] of LCC. Cost-in-use remains something different. There may be a shift in emphasis to suggest that WLC is not a one-off calculation, but may also be reviewed during the life of the building.'

'As I understand it, WLCC goes slightly beyond that to include costs beyond working life – in the case of a building project therefore demolition costs for example would be included . . .'

'In practice, we refer to WLC as the total operating costs of the building, including energy/utilities costs and facilities management elements that relate to the building, such as maintenance and cleaning. LCC refers to replacement building components within the building such as windows, fan coil units, etc. Over and above this are facilities management costs, such as security and catering.'

'Theoretically speaking, there is no difference between LCC and WLCC. Each sector adopts a different term. For example, the manufacturing and military [sectors] use LCC, whilst the construction industry may use WLCC and . . . oil, gas and prime contracting [companies] use through life cost (TLC). However, in the concept of the Private Finance Initiative (PFI), LCC means life-cycle replacement cost which is a part of WLC.'

It would be fair to speculate, after consideration of the points above, whether we really know what WLCC represents. In the absence of any internationally recognised standard on WLCC, it remains a subjective opinion based upon experience, field of work/study and economic standpoint. Of greatest importance is that not one of the respondents in the survey defined WLCC in similar terms; some though pointed out that LCC and WLCC were two of the same thing. In the absence of any national/international standard, who is to say that the above views are at worst incorrect or at least misguided? Although several institutions within the UK are currently working on WLCC-related projects, how can a wider understanding amongst practitioners and academics be initiated, when the research community as a whole is still confused about terms? Naturally it follows that an urgent need exists to define WLCC.

It is the authors' belief that a tangible difference exists between WLCC and LCC. We see WLCC as an evolution of LCC and not a re-invention of the wheel in terms of its association to LCC. Many have rightly noted that a fundamental problem with LCC is the aspect of uncertainty, the risk that is inherent in future forecasting. Some have gone so far as to say that LCC is based on 'guesswork' and 'speculation'. True, we will never be able to state with a very high degree of certainty how a building will perform economically in terms of operation, maintenance and such like. However, it is possible to quantify that risk, to enable stakeholders and decision makers to base capital investment proposals on a basis by which they are aware of the uncertainty in the forecasts. We are also concerned about the fact that the elemental deterioration of building components and the characteristics of the building itself are not integrated into the WLCC decision making process.

In consideration of the results of the survey, and based upon the previous research activities of the various institutions in the UK and elsewhere, the authors advocate the following definition as that of WLCC:

'Whole life-cycle costing (WLCC) is a dynamic and ongoing process which enables the stochastic assessment of the performance of constructed facilities from feasibility to disposal. The WLCC assessment process takes into account the characteristics of the constructed facility, reusability, sustainability, maintainability and obsolescence as well as the capital, maintenance, operational, finance, residual and disposal costs. The result of this stochastic assessment forms the basis for a series of economic and noneconomic performance indicators relating to the various stakeholders' interests and objectives throughout the life-cycle of a project.'

The WLCC assessment components included in the above definition will serve as the guiding principles for this book. WLCC and risk assessment are but part of the overall management of the whole life-cycle of project processes that comprise the art and science of decision analysis. This book addresses the risk assessment-related aspects of decision making in the process of WLCC. The aim is to convey to the reader the fundamental principles of WLCC and risk assessment and the enveloping processes.

Risk and uncertainty in WLCC

In the previous section, attention has been drawn to the importance of dealing with risk and uncertainty in WLCC analyses. This importance is reflected in the new definition. However, this leads us to a salient point. Is there a difference between uncertainty and risk?

The authors believe there is a great difference. The terms risk and uncertainty are often used interchangeably, although a distinction can be drawn by noting that the concept of risk deals with measurable probabilities while the concept of uncertainty does not. An event contains an element of risk where a probability distribution can be defined. An event is uncertain when no probabilities can be developed concerning its occurrence. Risk refers to probabilities of errors in decisions and WLCC forecasts throughout the life-cycle of a project, or the probabilities of occurrence of events. Risk assessment deals with the likelihood and expectation of possible WLCC outcomes using probability concepts. If computed in terms of the probability of success or failure to achieve the return on investment, the risk is seen as an objective risk. It is an uncertainty when the probability cannot mathematically be indicated but there is enough knowledge to make a subjective judgement about the WLCC decisions. The more explicitly the risk is defined, the greater the possibility for the decision maker to have confidence in using the results of the WLCC analysis.

Subjectivity in WLCC

The issue of subjectivity and vagueness is also a very important facet of WLCC. Subjectiveness, vagueness and ambiguity (used interchangeably in this book) are different from randomness. Randomness deals with uncertainty (in terms of probability) concerning the occurrence or non-occurrence of an event. Subjectivity, on the other hand, has to do with the imprecision and inexactness of events and judgements, including probability judgements. Many WLCC decision problems involve variables and relationships that are difficult, if not impossible, to measure precisely. For example, probability judgements about issues like inflation, operation costs, etc. are not always precise in WLCC and often cost analysts use subjective expressions to express their probability judgements. This applies to probability judgements as well as the costs and benefits in many WLCC decision problems. The requirement for high levels of precision may cause WLCC models to lose part of their relevance to the real world by ignoring some of the relevant decision attributes because these variables are incapable of precise measurement or because their inclusion may increase the complexity of the models. Hence, the key to successful WLCC and risk assessment is to build models that require little information – no more than the users can provide. This is a challenge, but it is a challenge that is addressed through the chapters of this book.

Summary

In this chapter we have looked at the evolution of WLCC and introduced some of the basic principles behind the technique. A working definition of WLCC is proposed, based upon the results of a survey, and we have also briefly introduced the importance of considering risk, uncertainty and subjectivity. In the following chapters we will look in closer detail at the techniques and procedures that are commonly used in WLCC modeling and how these techniques can be modified to cope with risk.

Dealing with risk and uncertainty in WLCC should be the cornerstone of the analysts' approach to WLCC decision making. The uncertainty of forecasting has always been a key problem with practitioners, so by providing information and quantifying the risk element, stakeholders should be more confident in the information that WLCC can provide.

Why has the construction industry failed to embrace WLCC?

Currently, the application of WLCC in the construction industry is still hindered significantly by the lack of standard methods and the excuse of lack of sound data upon which to arrive at accurate decisions. As a result, the output from WLCC models is looked on as unreliable. A government report issued by the Building Research Establishment (Cliff & Bourke 1998) on whole life costing identified several factors that presently act as barriers to applying WLCC:

WHOLE LIFE-CYCLE COSTING RISK MANAGEMENT

Introduction

Contemporary developments in the construction industry since the mid 1990s have highlighted the benefits that the whole life-cycle cost approach to investment appraisal can bring to the construction industry. Several reports, including those of Latham (1994) and Egan (1998), have strongly advocated the need to consider the long-term cost of design decisions. Guidance from other agencies has also stressed directly the need for design to encompass a WLCC approach. WLCC has been identified specifically as it gives the analyst the ability to generate tangible evidence of the sustainability of building facilities. It also allows insight into the economic efficiency and performance of the asset.

Recent guidance for projects procured using the Private Finance Initiative (PFI) route advocates the use of WLCC techniques specifically as they provide an assessment of the long-term cost effectiveness of a project. Investments in facilities are long-lived and necessarily involve uncertainty about project life, operating and maintenance costs, and many more factors that affect facilities economics. If there is substantial uncertainty concerning cost and time information, a WLCC analysis may have little value for decision makers. Therefore, it is essential to assess the degree of uncertainty associated with the WLCC results and to take that additional information into account when making decisions. Thus, risk management should form an integral part of the WLCC process. This chapter presents a framework for dealing with WLCC risk management.

Why Construction Industry fails to embrace WLCC

Currently, the application of WLCC in the construction industry is still hindered significantly by the lack of standard method and the excuse of lack of sound data upon which to arrive at accurate decisions. As a result, the output from WLCC models is looked on as unreliable. A Government report issued by the Building Research Establishment on Whole Life Costing identified several factors that presently act as barriers to applying WLCC:

- The lack of universal methods and standard formats for calculating whole life costs
- The difficulty in integration of operating and maintenance strategies at the design phase
- The scale of the data collection exercise, data inconsistency
- The requirement for an independently maintained database on performance and cost of building components.

These barriers might be directly related to the absence of adequate knowledge of WLCC processes and mechanisms. There may also be a lack of willingness from stakeholders to set up appropriate mechanisms to solve these problems. If, for example, all building occupiers were required to submit annual running cost profiles, the risk associated with WLCC techniques could be significantly reduced (Bird 1987). In fact, White (1991) argues the case for 'performance profiles' and in particular, highlights again the requirements for a universal construction data information system. One could argue that a plethora of WLCC models does exist but the common denominator in practical application and development is lack of appropriate information or know-how to use and develop models with existing information.

It seems to be worth noting how both the academic and practical 'schools of thought' in the industry need to get their own houses in order if significant steps are to be taken in the wider applications of WLCC. Newton (1991) in his work in cost modelling procedures highlights the need for a methodological and organised framework for such research activities. The sheer complexity of many models lends little to practical application and in many cases, if not the majority, the lack of available good quality data prohibits further development. In terms of the practitioners, they need to be willing to encourage clients and building occupiers into adopting a more holistic approach to running cost control so that procedures can be put in place to aid all those requiring WLCC cost profiles.

Why risk assessment in whole life costing?

Combined with WLCC, risk assessment should form a major element in the strategic decision making process during project procurement and also in value analysis, especially in today's highly uncertain business environment. WLCC decisions are complex (the complexity level is usually determined by the scale, funding and financial environment surrounding the scheme, amongst other factors), and usually comprise an array of significant factors affecting the ultimate cost decisions. WLCC decisions generally have multiple objectives and alternatives, long-term impacts, multiple constituencies in the procurement of construction projects, generally involve multiple disciplines and numerous decision makers, and always involve various degrees of risk and uncertainty. Project cost, design and operational decision parameters are often established very early in the life of a given building project. Often, these parameters are chosen based on owner's and project team's personal experiences or on an ad hoc static economic analysis of the anticipated project costs. While these approaches are common, they do not provide a robust framework for dealing with the risks and decisions that are taken in the evaluation process. Nor do they allow for a systematic evaluation of all the parameters that are considered important in the examination of the WLCC aspects of a project. The existing methods also do not adequately quantify the true economic impacts of many quantitative and qualitative parameters.

Capital costs and future costs must be quantified, analysed and presented as part of the strategic decision making process in today's business environment. Cost analysis and value analysis techniques are used to quantify and assess the economic implications of investment in building facilities in general. These techniques have typically concentrated on utilising life-cycle and comparative cost procedures to determine either the lowest initial cost alternative or the highest investment return alternative. While these techniques do provide a basis for making project cost decisions, they most often do not account for many of the parameters which may affect the actual project value or cost\ (Plenty et al. 1999). The existing methods also do not use formal decision making processes and risk assessment methods in performing cost benefit analysis.

It is not surprising that the BRE report (Clift & Bourke 1998) found that clients have a lack of interest and trust in the value of whole cost exercises. This might be due to the fact that WLCC analysis that is not supplemented with risk assessment of all aspects of decision making involved in this process has little value to any decision maker. Risk assessment should be an integral part of the WLCC process. A significant effort is being invested in developing a framework for data collection but data collection on its own, without the correct methods and tools to identify important decisions in the WLCC process and associated risks, is of little value to clients or other interested parties. Clients did not know what to do with information when received and practitioners did not understand the process or the benefits of WLCC (Clift & Bourke 1998).

A framework that uses formal decision making processes and risk assessment of each aspect of the decision to be taken in performing WLCC life-cycle analysis can help owners, design teams and cost planners in making strategic decisions based on analysis results that truly reflect the inherent risks and costs related to the project. Alternative building decisions can be evaluated and compared early in the project development stage. Simply choosing an alternative as being 'better' than the others, based on the traditional approach of life-cycle costing, may not be strictly correct. The confidence of the decision maker's choice depends on the level of uncertainty in the variables and decisions considered. If the WLCC computation results were aided with probabilistic information on the potential costs and risks of the various decisions that are taken throughout the whole life-cycle process of a facility, the confidence in the process of whole life-cycle costing would probably be increased. The subsequent chapters in this book are intended to provide this.

Data requirements in whole life-cycle costing and risk assessment

Flanagan and Norman (1983) highlighted three fundamental requirements in successfully implementing a life-cycle costing methodology:

- A system by which the technologies can be used: a set of rules and procedures
- Data for the proposed project under consideration: estimates of initial and running costs of elemental life-cycles, discount rates, inflation indices, periods of occupancy, energy consumption, cleaning and the like. The data required to carry out WLCC analysis can be derived from a range of possible sources (Bennett & Ferry 1987):
 - Direct estimation from known costs and components
 - Historical data from typical applications
 - Models based on expected performance, average, etc.
 - Best guesses of the future trends in technology, market application
 - Professional skill and judgement.

All these factors have some bearing on the quality of data that is collected and how it is used in modelling and decision making processes. Whilst WLCC is now becoming widely used as a valuable tool in the design process, probably two key factors have undersized its potential impact (Flanagan et al. 1987; Bird 1987):

- A suspicion that life-cycle cost estimates are in some sense inaccurate or based merely on guesswork
- The absence of sufficient and appropriate cost and performance data.

Data sources

It has been highlighted how important the data and its composition are to WLCC, but where can this data be obtained? Ferry and Brandon (1991) highlighted six main outputs:

- Technical press
- Builder's price books
- Information services such as the Building Cost Information Service (BCIS)
- Government research literature such as from the National Economic Development Office (NEDO)
- University research
- Technical information services.

Flanagan and Norman (1983) defined these into four subgroups:

- Manufacturers' data
- Suppliers and contractors

- Modelling techniques
- Historical data.

The availability of data has a significant impact upon the types of modeling techniques available to the analyst. For instance, monthly data for energy costs can be used to develop time-series forecasts, annual data can be used to model probabilistic distributions, etc.

Manufacturers' data

A unique aspect of the building process is its individuality and specialist requirement. Many building materials and indeed processes are subcontracted out to individual specialists. These specialists as a rule will have detailed breakdowns of the life-cycle of the product, its material components and its performance characteristics.

This data can also be obtained from other authorities that are responsible for testing the integrity and materials for construction. The British Board of Agrément is a UK government testing body which carries out independent testing of materials used in the industry. Materials that meet a set specification and performance are issued with Agrément certificates, which give details on service lives and other critical information. The Building Research Establishment also carries out testing on materials and can be a useful source of information. Furthermore, the American Society of Civil Engineers regularly publishes papers on building material life spans for use in cost profiling (Ehlen 1997).

Forecasts from models

In the absence of any historical or suppliers' data/feedback, models can be used as a way to analyse the WLCC implications of particular design decisions or choices of materials. The concept behind modelling is to facilitate and introduce a higher degree of accuracy in the estimates made by cost analysts when drawing up life-cycle cost profiles. Some dispute the validity of model forecasts but one school of thought advocates that simulated forecasts are as good if not better than historical data due to the following reasons (Ferry & Brandon 1991).

- Historical data by definition relates to the past, whereas simulated data refers to the future. The argument is that for maintenance and servicing costs, data recorded previously would be a poor guide as in the future more sophisticated facilities management techniques and higher quality products and reliability would provide for a different cost structure.
- It is very fortunate to obtain historical data that has not been trained or recorded for other purposes. Typically, in dealing with life-cycle costs, data may be required about a particular element but data may only be available generally for a whole group of elements. Simulation could provide this data in the required format.
- It is also believed that historical data can be inaccurate if those job-sheets and other forms filled in on a 'Friday afternoon' are maintained in a slipshod manner.

These idiosyncrasies can be dealt with, however, using a variety of statistical techniques to reduce data noise, data outliers and other characteristics which are likely to incorrectly skew the results. For example, outliers might be determined using box plots; missing or erroneous data sets are corrected using local means (averages). However, a thorough knowledge of the data used in the modelling should be acquired to ensure that the techniques used are valid and not likely to introduce biases into the modelling process.

Historical data

Historical data can be obtained from a variety of sources such as the BMCIS, clients and building occupiers and in some cases the design team themselves. The value of historical data is relevant in that the values of initial capital cost and subsequent running cost can be categorised for certain groups of element in the building and this comparison can then be used to identify the elements which will benefit from a life-cycle cost approach. For instance, if a building element has a high initial capital cost and then subsequently low maintenance and running costs, a life-cycle approach would gain little use. However, elements with significant running costs could, through design change, for instance, benefit from life-cycle cost savings.

Specifying a comprehensive set of objectives and measures for each WLCC component

The authors advocate, for this purpose, the use of operational research (OR) and methods described in risk assessment and decision making in business and industry (Pilcher 1992; Koller 1999). OR methods consist of a number of well-defined scientific steps:

- (1) Formulation of the problem, establishing the objectives and any constraints that may apply
- (2) Building a model that represents the system under analysis
- (3) Using the model in order to obtain a solution to the problem
- (4) Comparing a solution obtained by means of the model with that in current use
- (5) Evaluating the results and monitoring the performance of the system through changing conditions.

The above steps must be applied to every aspect of the WLCC. Therefore, the interactive steps that are involved in this process are:

Service life

The prediction of component service life is a very important aspect in WLCC assessment. One such methodology currently in use is the factor method.

The ISO/CD 15686-1 factor method for the estimation of the service life of components or assembly (facility) under specific conditions treats the service life as a deterministic value. In reality the service life has a big scatter and should be treated as a stochastic quantity. Here the authors advocate that at early stages of the project (design) this approach should be used but in conjunction with uncertainty and risk assessment for each of the involved factors. The objectives that need to be assessed include:

- Assumptions about the service life of the major facility components
- Risk of failure of components
- Quality of fabrication and production
- Assumption about the updating and maintenance management plans
- Cost constraints
- Assumptions about frequency and time intervals of maintenance and replacement.

At operation stage the requirements are different and necessitate a completely different method of assessment. The process here is concerned with the prediction of the remaining service life of the facility components and the forecasting of the rate of their deterioration and the maintenance budget required to bring the state of the facility to an operational standard. For this purpose the authors advocate the use of the Markov theory (explained in detail in Chapter 5). The objectives that need to be identified and assessed at this stage include:

- Survey condition of the existing facility components
- Assumption about the remaining service lives of components
- Updating budget requirement
- Priority of components updating – critical components
- Quality of maintenance and replacement components
- Assumption about time-lag replacement or maintenance delays

- The effect of delayed maintenance on budget and deterioration of facility
- Evaluating the economic viability with a view to disposal.

Obsolescence and end of use

Societal and business environments are characterised by rapid changes in technology and user patterns, which also result in changes in the requirements for infrastructure. Changes in use, trends in fashion (this is more likely to be in housing), and the emergence of new technologies (mainly mechanical services and IT) will have a direct effect on the life expectancy of components and facilities in general. Facilities should be designed and constructed with flexibility in mind to allow future adjustments for anticipated and/or likely changes. The objectives that should be identified and assessed include:

- Intangible costs, such as access disruption to building activities or other costs borne by other than clients, which will also be considered under this section
- Birth, growth and death of firms (business). This can be achieved by projecting the number of years that a business is viable. This will have a direct effect on the functional life expectancy of a facility. This assumption can be used for preparing a life-cycle cost analysis
- Physical obsolescence
- Economic obsolescence
- Technological obsolescence
- Functional obsolescence
- Legal and social obsolescence
- Disposal and decommissioning methods
- Demolition, retain or refurbish options
- Asset reuse or recycle of components
- Waste disposal implications
- Site and land clean-up procedures.

Capital costs

Returns on invested capital costs are essential in making decisions on investment scenarios. This requires a combination of knowledge about the investment in question, skill for analysis and elicitation of decisions from the existing information, experience and judgement. The capital cost for acquiring a facility will not be known with certainty until the facility is developed and handed over for operation. Hence, the information required for carrying out whole life-cycle cost and economic viability analysis relies on the availability of previously documented cases and speculative assumptions. The capital cost objectives that need to be assessed include:

- Land acquisition cost. The location, and land viability may have a direct effect on the whole life cost and life expectancy of a facility
- Predesign costs. The amounts of time and quality of information generated (development of the brief and facility specification) at this stage have great consequences on the quality and operation of a facility. The investors have a good opportunity to optimise the whole life cost of a facility through the selection of component and functional flexibility. Ideally, the issues relating to obsolescence should be investigated, accounted for as costs at this stage
- Design costs. The quality of design in terms of error, detailing and buildability will have a direct effect on the cost of production and operation. A high quality building might also require higher costs in use in order to maintain its high aesthetic quality in use (Ashworth & Hogg 2000)

- Development and production costs. The quality of workmanship is directly related to the level of maintenance. It is important to ensure that quality control is in place to ensure sound construction practices are used
- Fees
- Risk costs
- Financial costs, tax, interest, etc.

Operational costs

Operational costs are less certain as the time span increases due to uncertainties in energy costs, maintenance, fees, staff and regulatory changes. It is important to view operational cost estimates in their holistic state; several qualitative factors will have an important effect on the total operational costs.

The operational cost objectives that need to be assessed include:

- Factors which contribute significantly to the total operational costs
- Optimum balance between capital and operational costs
- Operational risk management systems
- Optimum asset cleaning procedures
- Optimum waste management procedures
- Optimum utilities management procedures
- Optimum staffing level
- Minimum disruption due to denial use of the asset.

Maintenance costs

The costs and priority of required maintenance, rehabilitation and replacement can be obtained from historical data but base cost estimates have to be supplemented with expert opinions in order to perform whole life-cycle analysis and risk assessment. The maintenance cost objectives that need to be assessed include (some are from Kirk & Dell'Isola 1995):

- Performance indicators for the assessment of maintenance costs
- Remaining service life of facility components
- Frequency and replacement costs
- In-house or subcontracted maintenance
- Selection of exterior and interior materials and surfaces
- Selection of light fixtures with minimum routine repair and replacement requirements
- Type of preventive maintenance programme.

Financing costs and revenues

The objective here is to deal with WLCC input parameters of discount, inflation rates, taxes, expenses, etc. Critical analysis of investments must include both initial and ongoing costs and returns over the period of the investment. This will allow stakeholders to compare different options and decide which offers the best return for the investment. Usually discount rate is used for computing the value of future revenues. This includes a large degree of risk return. For example, if the discount rate is set too high or too low then future costs may appear insignificant; this could result in high operational costs and capital costs, which will discourage investment. Also, if inflation is different from the selected rates this may lead to inappropriate investment choices. The financing cost objectives that need to be assessed include assumptions about:

- Inflation rates, interest and taxes
- Level of returns and risks
- Optimum discount rate
- Economic activity. This has a direct effect on the economic obsolescence of facilities
- Level of risk financing
- Cash inflows versus outflows
- Different rates, time periods and cash flows.

Asset characteristics

The characteristics (i.e. physical and functional) of new or existing facilities are very important aspects of WLCC computation. The research community has largely ignored this aspect of WLCC. For example, a relationship may exist between building function and mechanical services costs, a particularly important feature of modern facilities. Little research has been published with regard to the impact of building characteristics on WLCC. Experience shows that an indirect link exists through many aspects, including energy costs for example. A poorly insulated building will consume more energy, thus increasing WLCC and possible downtime costs in maintenance (Department of Industry 1977). The characteristics that should be assessed and included in the computation of WLCC include:

- Layout and location
- Functionality
- Construction technology
- Gross floor area
- Number of storeys and storey height
- Glazing area
- Occupancy (m²/person)
- Shape of the facility
- Aesthetics
- Energy-saving measures
- Quality of components
- Type and quality of public health systems
- Type and quality of superstructure building fabric
- Type and quality of internal fabric
- Type and quality of electrical and mechanical services
- Extent of site works.

Economic performance measures

The procurement of building facilities involves a variety of decision makers who decide on alternatives that generate capital and ongoing costs during a project's life. These capital costs generate value for different stakeholders and potential for returns to the project owner which should be durable over the life-cycle of the asset. Conventional investment appraisal techniques, which focus on cash flows represented by the costs and expected returns of a project discounted to a common base period, do not reflect the total value of capital expenditure choices which include intangible and non-monetary benefits as well as reduction of future costs and financial returns (Plenty et al. 1999). Usually these economic measures are not supported by any risk assessment analysis. Therefore, economic performance measurement in WLCC is very important for decision makers to evaluate and allocate identifiable value from capital and continuing costs to relevant stakeholders in the life-cycle of a facility. This will allow the consideration of different stakeholders' objectives in the assessment of the WLCC. The objectives that should be assessed under this heading should include:

- What type of performance indicators should be used to aid in the selection of alternatives
- The boundaries of these indicators, i.e. minimum and maximum values that the stakeholders are prepared to work to
- The best measures of performance in terms of WLCC outputs
- Mechanisms for WLCC benchmarking
- Measures for mitigating economic risks.

A framework for whole life costing risk management

WLCC risk management is one of the important issues facing building assets executives today. As spending on building assets rises, asset owners become increasingly worried about WLCC optimisation throughout the life span of facilities; consequently, they become highly vulnerable to the risk of operational costs. Usually, when decision makers are faced with an investment choice under uncertain conditions, their main concern is to avoid projects whose actual economic outcome might be less favourable than what is acceptable, resulting in the risk of missing out on potential investment opportunities.

Thus, the objective of WLCC risk management should be to assist decision makers in evaluating whole life alternatives so that investment success is maximised. Usually traditional methods are used to optimise this process. However, traditional approaches to risk management have failed miserably because of their demand for mysterious statistical data that the end user does not have (Koller 1999). The key to successful WLCC risk-process and risk modelling is to build a WLCC framework that requires from the user nothing more than they presently can provide. This can be a challenge that can be addressed through the use of a variety of techniques. That is why it is important to use a combination of risk management techniques (depending on the stage of assessment) for risk assessment in WLCC, ranging from simple deterministic approaches to uncertainty assessment (e.g. sensitivity and break even analysis methods which are easy to use and understand and require no additional methods of computation beyond the ones used in LCC analysis), to very sophisticated methods based on probabilities, artificial intelligence (AI) and a hybrid of both techniques.

There has been a great emphasis on the techniques that are used to model risks but there has been little work on the integration of the whole process of risk identification, quantification, response and management strategies. We believe strongly that these interlinked processes are essential ingredients for any successful risk framework in the life-cycle of assets. Figure 2.2 shows the interaction between these processes.

The whole life-cycle risk process for each stage of the project might be divided into five interactive steps, as shown in Fig. 2.2. This framework does not emphasise any one particular component (though identification is deemed to be the most important) of the WLCC risk management process but concentrates on the sequential and iterative linkage of the five components to make up the entire process of WLCC risk management. If WLCC risk is addressed in this fashion it should enable stakeholders to smoothly move forward and backward from one component to another by identifying and understanding the possible courses of action in the different steps. Such a framework should provide whole life risk managers with a comprehensive view of the overall WLCC risk management strategies. The framework, integrating the five iterative steps, is presented in Fig. 2.2 and explained in the following sections.

Whole life risk identification

The process starts with a qualitative stage that focuses on identification of risks related to each of the whole life-cycle processes. Risks that are unidentified and not quantified are unmanaged risks that can have a significant negative outcome on projects and organisations. If any of the unidentified risks occur at any stage of the project life-cycle, this may have serious consequences on stakeholders' financial status. Hence, perhaps the most important step in the whole life-cycle risk process is the process of risk identification. The quality of this process has a direct effect on the quality and accuracy of risk analysis, quantification, and development of risk strategy responses, and on the management of risk throughout the life span of projects. The output of risk identification will inform the second quantitative analysis process that focuses on evaluation and assessment of risks associated with each aspect of the life-cycle span of projects.

Whole life risk analysis

Several methodologies are available to deal with WLCC risk analysis. The techniques that can be used in WLCC risk assessment decision making might be summarised as deterministic, probabilistic and AI. Deterministic methods measure the impact on project outcomes of changing one uncertain key value or a combination of values at a time. In contrast, probabilistic methods are based on the assumption that no single figure can adequately represent the full range of possible outcomes of a risky investment (Fuller & Petersen 1996). Rather, a large number of alternative outcomes must be considered and each possibility must be accompanied by an associated probability from a probability distribution, followed by a statistical analysis to measure the degree of risk. Using a deterministic approach, the analyst determines the degree of risk on a subjective basis. AI methods differ from the above approaches and use historical data to model cost and uncertainty in WLCC analysis. None of these techniques can be applied to every situation. The best method depends on the relative size of the project, availability of data and resources, computational aids and skills, and user understanding of the technique being applied. We have not provided here a detailed explanation of all the risk analysis methodologies as these are adequately discussed in Chapter 5.

Whole life risk responses

Developing responses to reduce WLCC risks is the third step in the integrated WLCC risk management framework. Once the building assets and the many different risks and threats to which they are exposed are identified and quantified and the related life-cycle vulnerabilities assessed, necessary steps should be taken to ensure that the entire investment is protected from all sources of external and internal threats. Thus, the third stage is concerned with the identification of strategies that mitigate the effect of anticipated threats to the greatest extent possible. This should be based on the following universal rules: risk avoidance, risk reduction, risk absorption and risk transfer. The various risk responses that may be implemented to mitigate WLCC risks are explained in Chapters 9, 11 and 12.

Whole life risk management plan

Following the identification, quantification and development of risk responses, the related vulnerabilities of building assets need to be determined and planned for. This provides the basis on which risk management plans and decisions are made. The risk management planning process is concerned with putting in place the procedure for:

- What response actions are needed
- When these response actions are needed
- How these actions are implemented
- Who is responsible for the implementation, control and monitoring of the actual progress of risk responses and management strategies that have been developed to deal with the identified risk.

Whole life risk monitoring and feedback

The issue of risk monitoring is essential for ensuring effective implementation of risk control measures. Active risk monitoring ensures that effective response measures to manage the risks are appropriately implemented. Since we are dealing with the life-cycle of projects, the initial decision conditions may change over time, which could lead to the change of risks. Hence, a feedback and continuous assessment of risk through the entire life span of the project is very important in the process of whole life-cycle costing. This process should include tracking the effectiveness of the planned risk responses, reviewing any changes in priority of response management, monitoring the state of the risks, updating the whole life-cycle analysis accordingly and reviewing the economic performance indicators to check whether the investment decision is still valid or otherwise. In this way risk monitoring not only evaluates the performance of risk response strategies but also serves as a continuing feedback or audit mechanism.

The application of the above framework should take place during the early stages of asset development as well as at every project milestone, and should continue throughout the whole life of the asset. The information generated from the WLCC risk management framework should inform decision makers on which input data has the most impact on the WLCC result and how robust the final decisions are.

Summary

Evidence from research and practitioners alike has indicated strongly why WLCC has been treated with mistrust – the failure of models to adequately deal with uncertainty. Forecasts by their very nature can be risky to varying degrees, and stakeholders will imperil investment in capital projects if they are not fully equipped with the facts surrounding this uncertainty. It is therefore the responsibility of the analyst to ensure that the WLCC framework deals effectively with risk and provides the necessary information required to make effective decisions. In later chapters of this book we will look at the techniques and procedures that are available to the analyst to develop well-rounded WLCC models that are reliable and accurate.
